QUESTIONS PRESENTED

I. Did the Court of Appeals err in determining that the District Court must find, as a matter of law, the existence of a conspiracy by a preponderance of the evidence before allowing consideration of co-conspirators' statements in a civil case?

II. Did the Court of Appeals err in ruling that, following a determination that a defendant is not within the labor exemption from the antitrust laws, a plaintiff must nevertheless show predatory intent directed against the specific business of a plaintiff in addition to the usual elements of an antitrust violation?

PETITION FOR A WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE SIXTH CIRCUIT

Petitioners, James Snyder Co., Inc., Ebeling and Hicks, Inc., Clarence Gleeson, Inc., and Leo J. Vandervennet and Sons, Inc., respectfully pray that a Writ of Certiorari issue to review the judgment entered in this case by the United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit.

PROCEEDINGS BELOW

Petitioners commenced this case in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Michigan, Southern Division on July 27, 1970. In 1976, summary judgment in favor of certain defendants was granted and affirmed upon appeal, 546 F.2d 206 (6th Cir. 1976). Trial began for the remaining defendants but at the conclusion of the plaintiffs' proof the district court entered a directed verdict for the defendants. The opinion of the district court is set forth at App. B, infra, at 31a. The Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit affirmed on April 29, 1982. 677 F.2d 1111 (6th Cir. 1982). The opinion of the court is set forth at App. A, infra, at 1a.

JURISDICTION

The Judgment of the Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit was entered April 29, 1982. This Petition for Certiorari was filed within ninety days of that date. The jurisdiction of this Court is invoked under 28 U.S.C. § 1254(1).

STATUTORY PROVISIONS INVOLVED

Federal Antitrust Laws

Section 1 of the Sherman Act:

> Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several states, or with foreign nations, is declared to be illegal:. . . . (15 U.S.C. 1)

Section 4 of the Clayton Act:

> Any person who shall be injured in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws may sue therefor in any district court of the United States in the district in which the defendant resides or is found or has an agent, without respect to the amount in controversy, and shall recover threefold the damages by him sustained, and the cost of suit, including a reasonable attorney's fee. (15 U.S.C. 15)

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

Petitioners filed this class action to recover treble damages and obtain injunctive relief for the injuries sustained by them and others similarly situated as a result of violations of the federal antitrust laws by the Respondents and certain trade unions. Respondents have conspired with the trade unions participating in a multi-trade, multi-employer agreement to impose the terms of the wage agreement on Petitioners in violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act.

Petitioners are independent masonry contractors. They are also members of the Detroit Mason and Construction Association ("DMCA"), made up of the principal employers of bricklayers in the Metropolitan Area of Detroit. In addition to bricklayers, Petitioners also hire laborers (bricktenders) and other workers involved in the masonry construction business. Traditionally, the DMCA, on behalf of its members and other masonry subcontractors, has individually negotiated labor agreements with unions representing both the bricklayers and the laborers.

The principal Respondent is the Detroit Chapter of the Associated General Contractors of America ("AGC"). Its members are primarily general contractors engaged in building commercial and industrial properties. The AGC conducts labor negotiations and bargains in such negotiations on behalf of its member contractors. In regard to masonry work, its members both subcontract work to Petitioners on the basis of bids and, on other occasions, directly employ masons and related laborers.

Respondent Thomas E. Dailey is the President of Respondent R. E. Dailey and Co. and was the director of AGC in 1970. In that capacity, he was a member of the employer bargaining team which participated in the collective bargaining negotiations (hereinafter "Negotiations") involved in this action. In addition, he was the principal architect of and driving force behind the multi-trade bargaining agreement which is the subject of this lawsuit (hereinafter "Agreement").

The other Respondents include corporations that executed powers of attorney to AGC to bargain in their behalf; the Detroit Building Employers Labor Relations Council, known as the Construction Employers Council ("CEC"), composed of members of major employer groups except for the DMCA; and individuals involved in the Negotiations. On February 17, 1970, these Respondents and others executed a multi-trade, multi-employer bargaining agreement that fixed wages and fringe benefits for, among other trades, all bricklayers and laborers in the Metropolitan Detroit Area. Petitioners and others similarly situated did not participate in the Negotiations nor were they parties to the Agreement.

From at least 1968 until the Agreement was negotiated on February 17, 1970, the general contractors, working through their association, AGC, established as the primary objective for the 1970 negotiations a multi-trade, multi-employer agreement. Toward that end the Construction Employers Council was formed. The CEC consisted of approximately 26 employer groups. Respondent Dailey as the former President and Director of AGC, and Stanley Veighey, Director of Labor Relations for the AGC, were principally responsible for the efforts of the CEC.

Various meetings were held during 1969 between the AGC and CEC representatives and members of the trade unions, including Jack Wood, Secretary of the Greater Detroit Building Trade Council, toward the end of achieving multi-trade, multi-employer bargaining for the forthcoming 1970 negotiations.

On February 6, 1970, a format was agreed upon between the CEC and the trade unions. Paragraph 3 of the format provided there would be "no prior settlements with employers not participating in the multi-trade bargaining, who employ members of the participating unions." The bargaining unit was also appointed.

The first bargaining session—and as it turned out, the only bargaining session—was scheduled for February 16, 1970. The union initially demanded a $2.00 per hour wage package increase; the first dollar per hour to take effect at the expiration of the then-current contract and the second dollar per hour to take effect on June 1, 1971. This demand came at a time when the building industry was in a recession and was higher than the amount granted the unions in 1968 bargaining, which Mr. Dailey had considered absolutely excessive.

The employer representatives were startled by the demand, believing it to be highly unreasonable. Apparently, the union representatives also felt this was a high figure. However, knowing how badly the contractors and the associations were interested in multi-trade, multi-employer bargaining, the unions were prepared to make them pay extra to get the multi-trade concept off the ground.

Despite both the high money amount and the fact it would apply to all trades across the board, including laborers, the employer bargaining group agreed to accept the $2.00 an hour package. They did so because they believed it was the price they had to pay for multi-trade bargaining. This was done in a single session although, in the past, negotiations had taken weeks or even months to be completed.

Both Dailey and Veighey believed that multi-trade and multi-employer bargaining could not be sustained if the unions were to settle with any other employer groups except on the same terms and conditions contained in the multi-trade bargaining agreement. The effect on and reaction of other employer groups not a party to the negotiations, more specifically the Petitioners and the class represented, were discussed in detail by the employer negotiators at four caucuses during the bargaining session. The Respondents discussed how the Agreement would "hurt" Petitioners and others.

The employer group was warned by the unions that it should not settle with any other unions not parties to the Agreement on different terms. Mr. Veighey stated that the employer negotiators were willing to rely on the good faith of the unions to do likewise—not settle with other employer groups on different terms. He stated further that if either the employers or the unions were to settle with nonparticipants on different conditions, different terms of contract, or different dates, it would upset the apple cart, and the employers were trusting the union not to upset the apple cart.

Subsequently, when the DMCA attempted to negotiate with some of the same unions that participated in the multi-trade bargaining, its representatives, Petitioners Vandervennet and Snyder, were told by business agents for the Metropolitan Executive Committee of Bricklayers—co-conspirators in this action—that the union had made agreements with the multi-trade employers group for a dollar per year for a two-year contract and had agreed there would be no higher or lower agreements made with anybody else.

Further, Mr. Snyder was told by the bargaining agent for the locals representing laborers and hod carriers, that they "had made a deal with the AGC and Builders Association, on the agreement, that we were to sign that, or we didn't have any men."

In addition, approximately four months after the multi-trade Agreement,on May 27, 1970, when it appeared that the laborers' unions might settle with the DMCA on different terms, Mr. Dailey called a special meeting of the negotiating committee—both employer and employee representatives—by telegram. He called the meeting because he had heard that the agreement might be different from the multi-trade agreement. He did so because of fear of the effect a different agreement might have on the multi-trade bargaining process. Mr. Dailey stated that one of his major concerns was that this might cause an end to multi-trade bargaining.

The practical and intended effect of the Agreement was that Petitioners have been unable to negotiate for wages and fringe benefits for bricklayers and laborers that they directly employ, except upon the terms and conditions of the Agreement in which they did not participate. As a result, Petitioners and others similarly situated were forced, in order to remain in business, to pay higher wages and fringe benefits than otherwise would have been the case.

REASONS FOR GRANTING THE WRIT

I. The Court Of Appeals Has Decided A Question Of First Impression In Any Federal Court—The Standard Of Admissibility Of Co-Conspirators' Statements In Civil Cases—Which Should Be Decided By This Court Because Of The Importance Of The Issue To The Trial Civil Cases

At trial, the district court conditionally admitted two out-of-court statements made to the Petitioners by union bargaining agents. See p. 6 supra. The Respondents argued that the statements were inadmissible hearsay while Petitioners argued that the statements were not hearsay under Fed. R. Evid. 801(d)(2)(E)[1] as "statement[s] of a co-conspirator of a party during the course and in furtherance of the conspiracy." The statements were ultimately not admitted into evidence on the basis that Petitioners had not proven the existence of the conspiracy by a preponderance of the evidence. The court therefore granted a directed verdict at the close of the Petitioners' case.

The irony is that with the co-conspirators' statements in evidence, the case clearly would have gone to the jury. In granting the directed verdict, the District Court stated that if it admitted into evidence the co-conspirators' statements, there was sufficient evidence to allow the case to go to the jury. However, the Court held that to allow the co-conspirators' statements in evidence, the Petitioners would have to first prove the existence of the conspiracy by a preponderance of the evidence. This Petitioners had not done, the Court said, and, therefore, it must direct a verdict for Respondents. The District Court said:

[1] Fed. R. Evid. 801(d)(2)(E) states that "[a] statement is not hearsay if— * * * (2) The statement is offered against a party and is . . . (E) a statement by a co-conspirator of a party during the course and in furtherance of the conspiracy."

> "I don't think there is any question there was a conspiracy or an agreement between somebody; whether it's a conspiracy in the illegal sense of the word I'm not going to express an opinion at the moment but there had to be for this chain of events, there must have been some kind of agreement or meeting of the minds between union people or this could not have occurred. I don't think there is any question. I'm satisfied by a preponderance of the evidence that when the Detroit Mason Contractors Association sat down with the bricklayers and the material workers, the laborers unions that there was underlying that a feeling of commitment by the union people that they were obligated to hold out. I don't think that it would have occurred quite the same way it did and there wouldn't have been quite that hard a position taken by them unless they felt a commitment to somebody."

> "The real question is who was that commitment to and with, and essentially, in the final analysis, you have a group of defendants or some of them parties to such an agreement. That is one real distinct possibility. There are two bits, two or three things that indicae that is a possibility, is that it is definitely in the interest of the Associated General Contractors and the CEC to have the union hold in their mind, they wanted this concept to work, but that is common sense, there is nothing wrong with wanting it to work. Then there is a statement made by the union people, and I believe it occurred and I don't remember the names, but I do believe that some one or two of the union people told Mr. Snyder—I believe this to be credible—that they said they were committed to the AGC. . . .
> "The most damaging evidence of all, and I don't think we will ever know what happened, that there was a meeting of the minds, was Mr. Dailey's contract. I don't know what occurred; I could guess what occurred if his lawyer ever found out about it, but with his lawsuit pending, about the existence of a contract—of a telegram like that, that is what I meant, with a lawsuit pending over alleging a conspiracy to call a meeting with your alleged co-> conspirators and ask why the hell did you do something that we allegedly didn't expect you to do, would be pretty damn damaging, if you pardon the expression, and I would say this, that I think there is enough evidence, if all of this evidence is in, to take that issue to the jury, I think the jury could find that there is such a conspiracy, at least with some of the defendants."

> App. B., infra, 33a, 34a.

The District Court stated further:

> "[B]ut, gentlemen, I do not find as a fact that there was such a conspiracy. I am just not convinced myself by a preponderance of the evidence."
> App. B., infra, 34a.

The District Court concluded:

> "I think there is evidence, if we consider all this together, of the conspiracy; that if I don't strike the certain evidence under Enright, even though I don't find the facts myself, I believe a jury could come to a different conclusion and I would give it to the jury, the issue of whether or not there was a conspiracy."
> App. B., infra, 35a.

The Sixth Circuit affirmed, holding that the proper standard for the district court to use in deciding the initial question of the existence of a conspiracy was the "preponderance of the evidence" test. App. A., infra, 13a. In so doing, the Court of Appeals followed its earlier decision in United States v. Enright, 579 F.2d 980 (6th Cir. 1978), which required the preponderance of the evidence test in a criminal conspiracy trial.

This issue of the test governing the admissibility of co-conspirators' declarations in civil cases is a question of first impression which this Court has not, but should, resolve. It is a question which is critical to any civil conspiracy case, but particularly so to civil antitrust cases.

In Enright, 579 F.2d at 985, the Sixth Circuit recognized that "the fact-finding responsibilities of the judge and jury are distinct." That premise in Enright led the court to conclude that the criminal trial judge's ruling should be based on a lesser standard than that required from the jury. Thus, the criminal trial judge's determination of the existence of a conspiracy must be based upon a preponderance of the evidence.[2]

In determining whether the test should be a prima facie test, a preponderance of the evidence test, or the reasonable doubt standard suggested by Judge Weinstein, the Enright Court stated:

> The preliminary question—the existence of a conspiracy and the defendant's participation in it—may also coincide with an ultimate question of fact for the jury if a conspiracy is charged in the indictment. Nevertheless, the fact-finding responsibilities of the judge and jury are distinct. As Judge Coffin correctly noted in [United States v.] Petrozziello [548 F.2d 20 (1st Cir. 1977)], the trial judge is ruling on the admissibility of evidence, not guilt or innocence, and should not be bound by the reasonable doubt standard which guides the jury's deliberation. 548 F.2d at 23. This same point was made in cases prior to the Federal Rules of Evidence. 579 F.2d at 985-86.

The Enright Court concluded:

> In conclusion, therefore, we align ourselves both with the holding and the logic of the First Circuit, in Petrozziello:
> Although the prima facie standard is no longer appropriate [in a criminal case], we see no reason to require that conspiracy be proved beyond a reasonable doubt. That is the standard the jury will apply to the evidence as a whole. The judge is ruling on admissibility, not guilt or innocence; the government's burden need not be so great. 579 F.2d at 986.

In United States v. James, 590 F.2d 575 (5th Cir. 1978), cert. denied, 442 U.S. 917 (1979), the Fifth Circuit used the same reasoning as Enright to reach the same conclusion. The Fifth Circuit adopted the position that the standard for admissibility of evidence should not be the same as the standard for the finding by the ultimate trier of fact. Inasmuch as a jury must find the defendant guilty beyond a reasonable doubt, it was sufficient that the government meet a preponderance of the evidence test for the admission into evidence of co-conspirators' statements.

[2] As the Sixth Circuit correctly points out, the Enright decision was based in part upon an analysis of Fed.R.Evid. 104(a) and 104(b). Determining that Fed. R. Evid. 104(a) controls, however, does not dictate that a preponderance of the evidence test be used in civil cases.

In applying the Enright standard to civil cases, the Sixth Circuit therefore adopted the result of Enright and James, in defiance of the logic of the cases. Applying the preponderance of the evidence test to the threshold determination by the civil trial court usurps the fact-finding function of the jury. As happened in this case, the District Court essentially has ruled on liability issues, not upon the admissibility of evidence. The Sixth Circuit rationalized its conclusion by stating that applying the Enright rule in civil cases is desirable because it "provides a uniform standard for determining admissibility of co-conspirators' declarations in both civil and criminal contexts." App. A, infra, 12a. The Sixth Circuit's rationalization of its holding only blurs the analytical distinctions which were the underpinning of Enright and James and raises stringent standards inappropriate to a civil setting.

There is no uniformity in the jury standard for finding liability—preponderance of the evidence—and finding guilt in criminal cases—beyond a reasonable doubt. Therefore, it is highly prejudicial to a plaintiff in a civil case to face the same threshold standard for admissibility of co-conspirators' statements as the government faces in a criminal case.

II. The Decision Of The Court Of Appeals In An Antitrust Action To Which The Labor Exemption Is Not Applicable, That A Plaintiff Must Nevertheless Prove Specific Predatory Intent Directed At The Businesses Of The Plaintiffs In Addition To The Usual Elements Of An Antitrust Violation, Is In Direct Conflict With The Decision Of Another Court Of Appeals And With Decisions Of This Court.

In its opinion, the Sixth Circuit found that there was insufficient evidence to support a jury finding that the Respondents intended to drive the Petitioners out of business. The Court held that for the Petitioners to prove an antitrust violation, there had to be proof of specific predatory intent directed at the businesses of the individual Petitioners and the class they represent. App. A., infra, 19a. This holding is in direct conflict with the decision of the Third Circuit in Larry V. Muko, Inc. v. Southwestern Pennsylvania Building & Construction Trades Council, 670 F.2d 421 (3d Cir. 1982), petition for cert. filed, 50 U.S.L.W. 3804 (U.S. Mar. 26, 1982) (No. 81-1798), and with decisions of this Court. Ramsey v. United Mine Workers, 401 U.S. 302 (1971); United Mine Workers v. Pennington, 381 U.S. 657 (1965).

The Petitioners have alleged and presented evidence to prove that the Respondents and trade unions agreed on a wage level and agreed to impose that wage level on Petitioners. These allegations raise two issues. First, is the activity complained of within the statutory or nonstatutory labor exemptions from the antitrust laws? Second, if not, does the activity constitute an antitrust violation?

The Sixth Circuit concluded that the Respondents did not fall within the labor exemption from the antitrust laws. App. A., infra, 14a n.10, 15a. Having so decided, however, the Sixth Circuit added an additional element to proof of antitrust violations in labor cases under Section 1 of the Sherman Act which is not present in non-labor antitrust cases. The Sixth Circuit, therefore, has imposed upon the Petitioners the burden not simply of proving the usual elements of an antitrust violation, but also of proving predatory intent as "a necessary element for an antitrust violation arising from a union's commitment to employers to establish an industry-wide wage scale." App. A., infra, 18a. The Sixth Circuit has thus created its own special category of labor exemption from the antitrust laws.

The Sixth Circuit reaches its conclusion while recognizing this Court's precedent to the contrary. In referring to Ramsey v. United Mine Workers, 401 U.S. 302 (1971), the Circuit Court said,

> [a]lthough the Court did not specifically address the issue whether predatory intent was a requirement to a finding of antitrust liability, Justice White stated:
>
> > Where a union, by agreement with one set of employers, insists on maintaining in other bargaining units specified wage standards ruinous to the business of those employers, it is liable under the antitrust laws for the damages caused by its agreed-upon conduct.
> App. A., infra, 17a, quoting 401 U.S. at 313. (Emphasis added by Circuit Court.)

The Circuit Court then acknowledged that Justice White's statement "could conceivably be read broadly enough to substitute harmful effect for predatory intent as an element of the antitrust violation." Id. The Court, however, declined to read Ramsey in that way. Instead, it created a new test for antitrust liability in labor cases—predatory intent.

This decision of the Sixth Circuit is also in direct conflict with Larry V. Muko, Inc. v. Southwestern Pennsylvania Building & Construction Trades Council, 670 F.2d 421 (3d Cir. 1982), petition for cert. filed, 50 U.S.L.W. 3804 (U.S. Mar. 26, 1982) (No. 81-1798). In Muko, a nonunion general contractor sued a fast food chain and two labor organizations, alleging that the defendants had agreed to award contracts for building the fast food branches only to union contractors. The plaintiff claimed that the alleged agreement was a group boycott and a per se violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act. After a trial solely on the issue of liability, the jury found an agreement had been reached but the agreement was not an unreasonable restraint of trade. 670 F.2d at 424. On appeal of the jury verdict, the first issue the Third Circuit addressed was the proof required to show an antitrust violation.

The Third Circuit expressly reaffirmed an earlier holding in Consolidated Express, Inc. v. New York Shipping Association, 602 F.2d 494 (3d Cir. 1979), vacated and remanded on other grounds, 448 U.S. 902 (1980), that the determination of the applicability of an antitrust exemption is separate from determining the existence of an antitrust violation. 670 F.2d at 426. In deciding whether a particular activity is a per se violation of the antitrust laws, a court should employ the same analysis used in any market to conclude that conduct of a certain type invariably restrains competition. Id. The Third Circuit's view is that > it is unnecessary, if not improper, to weigh 'labor's legitimate interest in the collective bargaining process' twice—once in determining the labor exemption and again in deciding the antitrust liability question. 670 F.2d at 427.

Therefore, once the Third Circuit has found that the labor exemption does not apply, "traditional antitrust principles" will be used to evaluate the challenged activity. As a result, in Muko, no requirement of specific predatory intent was imposed on the plaintiff. In so holding, Muko follows the principles announced by this Court in Ramsey and Pennington, which the Sixth Circuit has declined to do.

Historically, predatory intent has played no part in Section 1 cases where impact upon competition, not competitors, is key. The Sixth Circuit's apparent determination to shield arrangements between management and labor from antitrust liability has far expanded the boundaries of the exemption that Congress has determined to be appropriate in this field. Once a plaintiff has produced evidence which takes the challenged activity outside the labor exemption, there is no rationale to add additional requirements for the proof of an antitrust case simply because the agreement at issue is related to union activities.

CONCLUSION

Petitioners respectfully urge this Court to grant this petition.

ENGEL, Circuit Judge.

Among numerous issues raised in these cross-appeals is a significant question concerning the application of the Federal Rules of Evidence, as they affect admission of coconspirators' out-of-court statements, and the extent to which our circuit's construction of these rules in criminal prosecutions applies also to civil litigation. Equally important, these appeals require us to consider the difficult issue of the sufficiency of the evidence of an alleged illegal antitrust conspiracy, where that evidence consisted almost entirely of actions which are permitted under the nation's labor laws. Upon consideration of these and other issues, we affirm a judgment entered by the district court following direction of a jury verdict in favor of the defendants.

Plaintiffs are independent masonry contractors in Detroit, Michigan. They are also members of the Detroit Mason and Construction Association (DMCA). DMCA members employ bricklayers and laborers in the metropolitan area of Detroit. Since 1958, the DMCA has negotiated labor agreements on behalf of its members and other masonry contractors with unions representing both the bricklayers and laborers.

The defendants, the Associated General Contractors of America (AGC), Detroit Chapter, Inc., the Detroit Building Employers Labor Council (also known as the Construction Employers Council) (CEC), and various members and officers of those organizations, entered into a multi-trade/multi-employer labor agreement [1] which had the effect of establishing wage rates and fringe benefits for construction workers in the metropolitan Detroit area. In their complaint, plaintiffs alleged that defendants had conspired with the unions which had participated in the multi-trade/multi-employer agreement to impose the terms of that agreement upon smaller non-signatory employers in an attempt to drive them out of business. Plaintiffs claimed that this conduct violated section 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1 (1976). Plaintiffs sought treble damages and injunctive relief under sections 4 and 16 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 15 and 26 (1976).

Trial commenced before a jury, but at the conclusion of the plaintiffs' proof the district court entered a directed verdict in favor of the defendants. The district court held that the plaintiffs had failed as a matter of law to establish a prima facie case for relief under the Sherman Act. The plaintiffs appeal, claiming that the trial judge improperly excluded from evidence certain out-of-court statements by alleged coconspirators which tended to prove an illegal agreement existed. They also claim that the evidence was sufficient to submit the issues to the jury regardless of whether the out-of-court statements were admitted into evidence. The defendants cross-appeal from the trial court's denial of their motion to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction under the Sherman Act.

I.

Because it raises the issue of subject matter jurisdiction, we first address the cross-appeal. Defendants contend that plaintiffs failed to prove that the alleged agreement restrained "trade or commerce among the several states. . . ." 15 U.S.C. § 1. Defendants properly assert that without proof of such interstate effects Sherman Act jurisdiction would be lacking.

At the jurisdictional hearing held prior to trial by the district court, plaintiffs presented evidence in an attempt to show that their activity as masonry contractors, while not directly in interstate commerce, substantially affected interstate commerce. Because defendants' alleged antitrust violations altered plaintiffs' interstate activities, plaintiffs argue that defendants' illegal acts served as a basis for Sherman Act jurisdiction. At the close of the proofs submitted during the jurisdictional hearing, the district court found that plaintiffs engaged in no masonry work outside the State of Michigan, or at least they would not be bound by the terms of any labor contract negotiated in Michigan if they were to do so.[2] It therefore concluded that plaintiffs' businesses were not directly in interstate commerce for the purposes of this litigation.

Because Sherman Act jurisdiction exists not only when activities are in interstate commerce but also when activities have an effect on interstate commerce, see McLain v. Real Estate Board of New Orleans, 444 U.S. 232, 242, 100 S.Ct. 502, 509, 62 L.Ed.2d 441 (1980), the district court continued its factual determination and found that plaintiffs acquired between fifteen and twenty-five percent of their prime commodity, bricks and masonry products, from outside Michigan. It further found that as a result of the monetary settlement contained in the multi-trade/multi-employer labor agreement, plaintiffs later had to accept labor contracts with the bricklayers and laborers which provided wages and fringe benefits in excess of what they otherwise would have had to pay; that the plaintiffs lost business due to the need to increase their bid prices on construction projects to cover the higher labor costs they incurred as a result of the new labor contract; and that because plaintiffs were less successful in securing construction projects, they purchased fewer bricks and other masonry products from out of state.

The district court also found, however, that the total demand for masonry work in the Detroit area was not affected by the wage scale paid to bricklayers and laborers. Therefore, any work lost by plaintiffs was gained by other masonry contractors. Because plaintiffs' competitors also purchased bricks and masonry products from out of state, the same amount of those materials continued to flow into the State of Michigan from interstate commerce, and any work lost by plaintiffs was gained by others.

The defendants relied upon a number of cases in which it has been held that the mere substitution of purchasers of goods from interstate commerce confers no jurisdiction under the Sherman Act. See Page v. Work, 290 F.2d 323, 332 (9th Cir. 1961), cert. denied, 368 U.S. 875, 82 S.Ct. 121, 7 L.Ed.2d 76 (1961); Dominion Parking Corp. v. B & O Railroad, 450 F. Supp. 441, 446 (E.D.Va. 1978). The rationale of those decisions was that interstate commerce was not substantially affected since the same amount of supplies still flowed into the state.

The district court below, however, relied upon Lehrman v. Gulf Oil Corp., 464 F.2d 26 (5th Cir. 1972), in finding that the plaintiffs had established jurisdiction under the Sherman Act. In Lehrman, a single Gulf service station in Texas sued Gulf for treble damages under the Sherman Act, alleging that Gulf's complicated system of setting wholesale prices for its gasoline was used as a mechanism for fixing the retail prices at which dealers resold Gulf gasoline. Because the vast majority, if not one hundred percent, of the gasoline sold by Gulf to Lehrman was produced in the State of Texas, Gulf asserted that Lehrman had not shown jurisdiction under the Sherman Act. The Fifth Circuit held that since the Lehrman service station also sold tires, batteries and accessories which were manufactured outside of Texas, and since there was a reduction in Gulf's interstate purchase of those items even if the absolute volume of such purchases remained constant in Texas after Lehrman went out of business, a sufficient nexus with interstate commerce existed.

We agree with the district court that the Sherman Act has sufficient reach to touch the activities here. That reach has been held to extend as far as Congress' constitutional power to regulate interstate commerce. Gulf Oil Corp. v. Copp Paving Co., 419 U.S. 186, 201, 95 S.Ct. 392, 401, 42 L.Ed.2d 378 (1974). Whatever questions may have existed concerning Sherman Act jurisdiction where there has been a substitution of purchasers of goods from interstate commerce, they no longer exist after the more recent decisions of the Supreme Court on this subject.

In Hospital Building Co. v. Trustees of Rex Hospital, 425 U.S. 738, 96 S.Ct. 1848, 48 L.Ed.2d 338 (1976), the plaintiff alleged that the defendants were engaged in an unlawful conspiracy to restrain trade in the furnishing of medical and surgical hospital services and that they were attempting to monopolize the hospital business in Raleigh, North Carolina. The district court dismissed petitioner's amended complaint on the pleadings, finding no Sherman Act jurisdiction. The Fifth Circuit, sitting en banc, affirmed. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that four of petitioner's allegations supplied the requisite jurisdictional facts. First, petitioner purchased supplies from out-of-state sources. Second, petitioner received revenues from out-of-state insurance firms. Third, petitioner remitted management fees to its out-of-state parent corporation. Fourth, petitioner would borrow from out-of-state lenders to finance some of its planned expansion. The Court found it irrelevant that no out-of-state supplier, insurer, or lender would "go under," or that no market price would be affected.

Later, in McLain v. Real Estate Board of New Orleans, 444 U.S. 232, 100 S.Ct. 502, 62 L.Ed.2d 441 (1980), the plaintiff's complaint alleged that real estate brokers in the greater New Orleans area had agreed to a fixed rate of brokerage commissions on sales of residential property. This, the plaintiff alleged, was a price-fixing conspiracy in violation of section 1 of the Sherman Act. The district court dismissed the complaint for failure to establish the interstate commerce component of Sherman Act jurisdiction. The Fifth Circuit affirmed. Again, the Supreme Court reversed. The Supreme Court held that the plaintiff need only allege an interrelationship between the intrastate activity which was the target of the unlawful conduct and a specified aspect of interstate commerce. If those allegations were controverted, the plaintiff must then prove that the defendant's conduct had, as a matter of practical economics, a not insubstantial effect on the interrelated activity which was demonstrably in interstate commerce. In McLain, the interrelated activity was alleged to have been the involvement of out-of-state suppliers, insurers, lenders and the out-of-state parent corporation. There was no suggestion in McLain that it was necessary to show that the aggregate amount of supplies, insurance or financing from interstate sources would have been diminished by the alleged unlawful activity.

The facts here are parallel to those alleged in McLain. Plaintiffs alleged that there had been a conspiracy to require conformance with a fixed rate of labor. A substantial amount of products which were involved in plaintiffs' businesses was purchased from out of state. Plaintiffs' purchases of those products decreased as a result of the defendants' conduct. Therefore, the targeted activity (labor) was shown to have been interrelated with a specified aspect of interstate commerce (purchase of out-of-state products), and defendants' conduct was shown to have had a not insubstantial effect on plaintiffs' purchases of those products from interstate commerce. It was not necessary that plaintiffs further show that their out-of-state suppliers would "go under," or that the market price for such goods in interstate commerce would be affected. Nor was it necessary to show a decrease in the interstate flow of those products into the State of Michigan.[3] [3] We are aware that a confict exists between the circuits regarding McLain. The Ninth Circuit has held that Sherman Act jurisdiction exists when any business activity of a defendant affects interstate commerce. Western Waste Service v. Universal Waste Control, 616 F.2d 1094 (9th Cir. 1980). Under a more conservative view of the reach of the Sherman Act, the Tenth Circuit has taken the position that a defendant's illegal activities must affect interstate commerce for jurisdiction to be present. In the instant case, because the evidence supports a finding that defendants' alleged illegal actions affected interstate commerce, we need not decide whether Sherman Act jurisdiction could be founded solely on proof that defendants' general business activity affects interstate commerce.

II.

In support of their contention that defendants entered into an agreement with the unions to set a wage scale for the entire industry, plaintiffs attempted to put into evidence two out-of-court statements made to plaintiffs by union negotiators. The first statement was made by Carlo Martino, the chairman of the bricklayers' union executive committee. James R. Snyder testified that during the bricklayers' labor contract negotiations with the DMCA, Martino told plaintiffs Vandervennet and Snyder that:

> they really like our offer that we made but there was no way possible that they could change from the agreement they made with the multi-bargaining group, the contract they signed, that they were stuck with that.

Trial Transcript at 253. The second statement was made by bargaining agents for Laborers' Locals 334 and 1076, to the effect that they had "made an agreement with A.G.C. and would not go back on it." Trial Transcript at 264. Defendants made timely objections to the admission of these statements on the ground that they were hearsay, and plaintiffs responded that the statements were admissible under Federal Rule of Evidence 801(d)(2)(E),[4] as statements of coconspirators made in the course of and in furtherance of a conspiracy. Although these statements were conditionally admitted, the trial court eventually refused to consider them as being properly in evidence because the plaintiffs had not proven the existence of a conspiracy by a preponderance of the evidence, as required under United States v. Enright, 579 F.2d 980 (6th Cir. 1978).

[4] Fed.R.Evid. 801(d)(2)(E) declares that statements of coconspirators in the course of and futherance of a conspiracy are not hearsay:

> (d) Statements which are not hearsay. A statement is not hearsay if—
> (2) Admission by party-opponent. The statement is offered against a party and is. . . (E) a statement by a coconspirator of a party during the course and in furtherance of the conspiracy.

In Enright, the defendant was charged with criminal conspiracy. There was "extensive evidence" that an illegal conspiracy existed, but the prosecution offered out-of-court statements by alleged coconspirators to prove Enright's longstanding role in it. The issue was what standard of proof of conspiracy and of the defendant's connection to it would permit such statements to be admitted into evidence under Federal Rule of Evidence 801(d)(2)(E). The court held that the trial judge must be convinced by a preponderance of the evidence that a conspiracy existed and that the defendant participated in it before such statements were admissible.

Plaintiffs contend that since Enright was a criminal conspiracy case, the district court erred in applying the preponderance of the evidence standard to this civil case. Plaintiffs argue that one consideration in Enright which led to the adoption of the preponderance of the evidence standard was the desire to prevent the trial judge from usurping the jury's ultimate fact-finding function while ruling on the admissibility of evidence. Following logically from this, plaintiffs assert, the less stringent prima facie test should be employed by the trial judge in ruling on the admissibility of coconspirators' statements in civil conspiracy cases because the jury uses the preponderance of the evidence standard in fulfilling its ultimate fact-finding function.

Before adoption of the Federal Rules of Evidence, case law in this circuit held that out-of-court statements by alleged coconspirators were admissible in civil conspiracy cases upon a prima facie showing by independent evidence that a conspiracy existed and that the defendant was connected with it. South-East Coal Co. v. Consolidation Coal Co., 434 F.2d 767, 779 (6th Cir. 1970), cert. denied, 402 U.S. 983, 91 S.Ct. 1662, 29 L.Ed.2d 149 (1971). The preliminary question of the admissibility of this evidence was a matter for the judge, not the jury, to decide. Id. at 788. The adoption of the Federal Rules, however, has brought about significant changes in this area. First, as this court held in United States v. Enright, supra, the prima facie test is too lenient a standard to be employed under the Rules. This holding primarily resulted from the court's resolution of the question whether Rule 104(a),[5] or Rule 104(b),[6] applies to the admissibility of coconspirator's out-of-court statements. Rule 104(a) provides that preliminary questions of admissibility shall be determined by the trial court, while Rule 104(b) deals with preliminary questions of admissibility when the relevancy of the evidence depends upon the fulfillment of a condition of fact. Finding the question "to be more one of basic reliability and fairness of admitting the evidence rather than a relevancy question . . .," the court concluded that "a fair reading of subsections (a) and (b) favors the construction that 104(a) should be applicable to the question of the admissibility of a co-conspirator's statements." 579 F.2d 984.

Because the court in Enright viewed Rule 104(b) "as a classic restatement of the prima facie test," 579 F.2d 984, it was led to the conclusion that:

> the framers of 104(a), whatever else they may have intended, probably did not intend that the trial judge employ a prima facie test in resolving issues arising under that subsection. A determination under 104(a) is more demanding than a prima facie test and calls for the exercise of judicial fact-finding responsibilities by the trial

[5] Fed.R.Evid. 104(a) provides:

Questions of admissibility generally. Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

[6] Fed.R.Evid. 104(b) provides:

Relevance conditioned on fact. When the relevancy of evidence depends upon the fulfillment of a condition of fact, the court shall admit it upon, or subject to, the introduction of evidence sufficient to support a finding of the fulfillment of the condition.

> judge, responsibilities which require him to evaluate both credibility and the weight of the evidence.

579 F.2d 985 (footnote omitted). Recognizing that the fact-finding responsibilities of the judge and jury are distinct, the court adopted the preponderance of the evidence, rather than the reasonable doubt standard.

Also, since the decision in South-East Coal Company, this circuit has done away with the requirement that the conspiracy's existence and the defendant's participation therein be shown only by independent evidence. The out-of-court statements themselves now may be used to convince the trial judge of the conspiracy's existence and the defendant's participation in it. United States v. Kendricks, 623 F.2d 1165, 1168 n.5 (6th Cir. 1980); United States v. Vinson, 606 F.2d 149, 153 (6th Cir. 1979). Vinson, as a practical matter, makes the preponderance standard easier to meet when presenting evidence to the trial judge on preliminary matters.

These post-Rules decisions lead us to the conclusion that the preponderance of the evidence standard should be used to determine the admissibility of out-of-court statements by alleged coconspirators in civil as well as criminal cases. Enright was based upon this court's construction of the Federal Rules of Evidence rather than upon notions of criminal law or procedure. Except as constitutional considerations or statutes otherwise require, the same rules apply to civil and criminal cases. See Fed.R.Evid. 1101(b).[7] Use of the preponderance

[7] Fed.R.Evid. 1101(b) provides:

> (b) Proceedings generally. These rules apply generally to civil actions and proceedings including admiralty and maritime cases, to criminal cases and proceedings, to contempt proceedings except those in which the court may act summarily, and to proceedings and cases under the Bankruptcy Act.

It could be argued that the burden of proof for admissibility in a civil case should be less than that in a criminal case, because the civil defendant is not exposed to the risk of loss of liberty and, hence, has a standard in civil conspiracy cases provides a uniform standard for determining admissibility of coconspirators' declarations in both civil and criminal contexts. See Sessions & Hall, The Coconspirator's Statement: Evaluating Preliminary Questions of Admissibility Under Rule 801(d)(2)(E), 11 St. Mary's L.J. 83, 112 (1979); Comment, The Impact of Federal Rule of Evidence 104 on the Coconspirator Exception to the Hearsay Rule, 28 Emory L.J. 1115, 1133 (1979).

It is argued that a preponderance of the evidence test usurps the function of the jury to determine whether a conspiracy exists. This has surface appeal until it is remembered that what is involved here is a ruling on the admission or exclusion of particular evidence, and on this question only. As with all such judicial decisions on admissibility, the effect upon the outcome may be profound, but this comes from the ruling itself and not from the manner in which the law requires the trial judge to make it.[8] lesser need for protection from incompetent evidence. This argument, however, misunderstands the basis for the Enright decision. In Enright, we were first guided by an interpretation of Rules 104(a) and 104(b) in reaching the conclusion that the Rules had eliminated the prima facie standard for preliminary questions of competency. We only then determined that use of the preponderance standard in making these evidentiary decisions would satisfy constitutional concerns which might arise in criminal cases. U. S. v. Enright, supra, 579 F.2d at 984-85. Enright thus illustrates that the issue is primarily one of interpreting the Federal Rules of Evidence, rather than considering the burdens of proof required for the substantive issues in the case.

[8] By applying Enright to civil litigation, we do not diminish the value of the coconspirator's statements in proving the existence of a conspiracy since, as Vinson makes clear, the coconspirator's statements may be considered by the trial judge in making the evidentiary determination. Moreover, if admitted, those statements may make the other evidence on the existence of a conspiracy more credible to the jury.

Thus we agree with the district judge that the statements of the alleged coconspirators would be admissible to prove the existence of the illegal conspiracy only if, as a preliminary matter, the district judge found a conspiracy by a preponderance of the evidence.

III.

A.

In their complaint, plaintiffs alleged that defendants had conspired with the bricklayers' and laborers' unions to impose the multi-trade/multi-employer collective bargaining agreement's terms upon smaller non-signatory employers in an attempt to drive them out of business in violation of section 1 of the Sherman Act. By seeking to apply antitrust laws to an agreement reached under provisions of the labor law,[9] plaintiff's complaint illustrates and raises questions of an inevitable, basic tension between two firmly established national policies. On one hand, labor law favors collective bargaining and agreements limiting competition for labor. Antitrust law, on the other hand, promotes competition and declares illegal those agreements which unreasonably restrict commerce. To reconcile these conflicting policies and to protect unionism and collective bargaining from destruction under the guise of antitrust law enforcement, both Congress and the courts have created exemptions to antitrust law for labor activity.[10] Although some areas of the antitrust-labor interface may remain unclear, the Supreme Court in United Mine Workers v. Pennington, 381 U.S. 657, 85 S.Ct. 1585, 14 L.Ed.2d 626 (1965) addressed allegations substantially the same as those made by plaintiffs in the present case and refined the scope of the labor exemptions.

[9] In multi-employer/multi-union bargaining, the employers agree to bargain as a group, as do the unions. The duty to bargain in this type of arrangement has been enforced by the National Labor Relations Board under section 8(b)(3) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(b)(3). See, e.g. Local 260, Wood, Wire and Metal Lathers International Union, 228 NLRB No. 179 (1977).

In Pennington, a small coal company alleged that the UMW had agreed with a multi-employer group of large mineowners to cooperate in a variety of tactics to drive smaller coal companies out of business. In furtherance of this purpose, the UMW agreed with the multi-employer group to establish a uniform wage rate for all coal companies, a rate higher than that which the small companies could afford. The UMW argued that this agreement was exempt from the antitrust laws because it dealt with wages, a mandatory subject of bargaining under labor law. Justice White, in the opinion of the Court, rejected this argument and stated:

> [W]e think a union forfeits its exemption from the antitrust laws when it is clearly shown that it has agreed with one set of employers to impose a certain wage scale on other bargaining units. One group of employers may not conspire to eliminate competitors from the industry and the union is liable with employers if it becomes a party to the conspiracy. This is true even though the union's part in the scheme is an undertaking to secure the same wages, hours or other conditions of employment from the remaining employers in the industry.

381 U.S. at 665-66, 85 S.Ct. at 1590-91. Similarly, in the instant case plaintiffs' allegation that defendants agreed with unions to impose a wage scale upon plaintiffs would, if proved, prevent the use of a labor exemption by defendants.

In Federal Maritime Commission v. Pacific Maritime Association, 435 U.S. 40, 98 S.Ct. 927, 55 L.Ed.2d 96 (1978), the Supreme Court cautioned that the question of antitrust liability must be analyzed separately from that of non-exemption:

> It is plain from our cases that an antitrust case need not be tried and a violation found before a determination can be made that a collective-bargaining agreement is not within the labor exemption, just as it is clear that denying the exemption does not mean that there is an antitrust violation.

435 U.S. at 61, 98 S.Ct. at 939 (footnote omitted) (emphasis added). Thus, although proof of an agreement between defendants and the unions to impose a wage scale on plaintiffs would eliminate any claim of a labor exemption from the antitrust laws, a determination of the elements of an antitrust violation requires further analysis.

This court has considered the antitrust implications of extra-unit wage agreements in a series of cases involving the coal industry.[11] Following the Supreme Court's decision in Pennington, we had our first occasion to address the requirements for proof of antitrust liability in Lewis v. Pennington (Pennington II), 400 F.2d 806 (6th Cir. 1968). Judge Peck examined the opinions of Justices White and Douglas, and concluded that the Sherman Act made illegal "a conspiracy between employers and labor formed with the intention of driving competitors out of business. . . ." 400 F.2d at 814 (emphasis added). Later, in Ramsey v. United Mine Workers (Ramsey I), 416 F.2d 655 (6th Cir. 1969) (en banc), rev'd on other grounds, 401 U.S. 302, 91 S.Ct. 658, 28 L.Ed.2d 64 (1971), the court split evenly on the issue whether elements of the antitrust violation had to be established by "clear proof." The opinions of Judge Edwards and Judge O'Sullivan, however, both quoted Judge Peck from Pennington II regarding predatory intent, and neither opinion expressed any disagreement with this need for a showing of anticompetitive purpose. 416 F.2d at 655 and 673. In South-East Coal Co. v. Consolidation Coal Co., 434 F.2d 767 (6th Cir. 1970), cert. denied, 402 U.S. 983, 91 S.Ct. 1662, 29 L.Ed.2d 149 (1971), we summarized our prior decisions in Pennington II and Ramsey I regarding antitrust liability that could arise when a labor union has agreed with an employer to impose a wage scale on non-signatory employers:

> [I]f this agreement was made or entered into by the union in pursuance of its own self interests, there are no grounds > for concluding a violation of the antitrust laws. . . . [I]f, however, the employers and union entered into this contract with the conscious knowledge or intent that it would be used to drive competitors out of business (more than the incidental effects caused by the adoption of a uniform wage agreement which may result in certain operators not being able to function profitably), then a violation of the antitrust laws has occurred.

434 F.2d 782 (emphasis added).

After South-East Coal, the Supreme Court held in Ramsey v. United Mine Workers, 401 U.S. 302, 91 S.Ct. 658, 28 L.Ed.2d 64 (1971), that the ordinary preponderance standard, rather than clear proof, should be applied in antitrust actions against unions. Although the Court did not specifically address the issue whether predatory intent was a requirement to a finding of antitrust liability, Justice White stated:

> Where a union, by agreement with one set of employers, insists on maintaining in other bargaining units specified wage standards ruinous to the business of those employers, it is liable under the antitrust laws for the damages caused by its agreed-upon conduct.

401 U.S. at 313, 91 S.Ct. at 665 (emphasis added). Upon remand, the district court stated that the above quoted language from Ramsey I allowed proof of a per se violation without the need to show predatory intent, Ramsey v. United Mine Workers, 344 F. Supp. 1029, 1033 (E.D.Tenn. 1972). On appeal, this court in an opinion by Judge Edwards affirmed the decision that a conspiracy had not been proved, and rejected Ramsey's claim of a per se violation. Ramsey v. United Mine Workers (Ramsey II) 481 F.2d 742 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 414 U.S. 1067, 94 S.Ct. 576, 38 L.Ed.2d 28 (1973).

Although the dictum of Justice White in Ramsey could conceivably be read broadly enough to substitute harmful effect for predatory intent as an element of the antitrust violation, we decline to do so for a number of reasons. Most important, an elimination of the predatory intent requirement would be inconsistent with the concurring opinion in Pennington, which provided a limitation on the Court's decision. See United Mine Workers v. Pennington, supra, 381 U.S. at 673, 85 S.Ct. at 1585 (Douglas, J., concurring) (requiring that the agreement be made "for the purpose of forcing some employers out of business"); Lewis v. Pennington, supra, 400 F.2d at 814 (holding that a majority of the Supreme Court in Pennington required a finding of predatory intent). There is no other indication in Ramsey, however, that the Court intended to expand the scope of liability that it set forth in Pennington. Moreover, in Ramsey II, we implicitly rejected the idea that a per se antitrust violation could exist based on proof of an agreement but without proof of predatory intent. See P. Areeda and D. Turner, I Antitrust Law 208 n.71 (1978). Where legitimate union agreements with multi-employer groups will always reduce some competition over wages, the requirement of predatory intent is necessary to limit the application of the antitrust laws to truly anticompetitive behavior between firms in an industry.

Other circuits have held that predatory intent is a necessary element for an antitrust violation arising from a union's commitment to employers to establish an industry-wide wage scale. In Smitty Baker Coal Co. v. United Mine Workers, 620 F.2d 416 (4th Cir. 1980), the Fourth Circuit made an extensive review of the decisions of our court and concluded:

> It would appear established beyond controversy by these Sixth Circuit decisions . . . that for an agreement between the Union and the multi-employer group to constitute an antitrust violation it must arise out of a predatory intent. . . .

620 F.2d at 431. In addition, the Fifth and Seventh Circuits have required a showing of anticompetitive purpose. Embry-Riddle Aeronautical University v. Ross Aviation, Inc., 504 F.2d 896, 903 (5th Cir. 1974); Associated Milk Dealers, Inc. v. Milk Drivers' Local 753, 422 F.2d 546, 554 (7th Cir. 1970). We also note that many commentators have voiced approval of this requirement.[12]

Therefore, we conclude, after a review of Supreme Court decisions, cases from this circuit and other circuits, and the literature in the antitrust-labor area, that plaintiffs in the present case had the burden of proving first that defendants and unions agreed to impose wages upon plaintiffs, and second that defendants entered into this agreement with the intent to injure the plaintiffs' businesses, i.e., with predatory intent.

As an initial basis for the directed verdict, the district judge held that plaintiffs had not presented sufficient evidence on the first element, the existence of an agreement or conspiracy. Applying Enright (properly, as we have determined in part II of this opinion), the district court excluded the hearsay statements after making a factual finding that appellants had failed to prove the existence of a conspiracy by a preponderance of the evidence.[13] With the Enright statements excluded, the district court determined that a rational jury could not find the existence of an agreement or conspiracy based on the remaining evidence. In an informal ruling from the bench, the district judge concluded that while there may have been proof of a conspiracy or agreement among the union people themselves to negotiate the same wage rate with plaintiffs as had already been obtained from defendants, there was insufficient admissible evidence of any agreement or conspiracy between the unions and defendants to submit that issue to the jury.

> I do not find as a fact that there was an agreement between the employer groups and the Union groups that the unions would not enter into an agreement at a different economic package. I think there is a strong expectation and, as I say, Mr. Dailey's telegram causes me to have some concern but weighed against all the other facts, I do not find [the agreement] to be a fact. . . . [T]hen under the Enright case, the most damaging evidence that could go to the jury comes out with it and it would have to be a directed verdict.

Trial Transcript at 1173. We agree with the trial judge that plaintiffs did not present sufficient admissible evidence on the issue of an agreement between defendants and the unions to avoid a directed verdict.

[13] In making his Enright determination that plaintiffs had not proved a conspiracy or agreement by a preponderance of the evidence, the trial judge followed this court's decision in United States v. Vinson, 606 F.2d 149 (6th Cir. 1979), and properly considered all the evidence, including the hearsay statements. Although plaintiffs have challenged the standard of proof applied by the trial judge, they have not claimed, and we would be unable to hold, that despite applying the proper legal standard the judge's factual determination was clearly erroneous.

By its language, section 1 of the Sherman Act[14] applies to three different types of conduct: contract, combination, or conspiracy. These terms have been interpreted generally to cover concerted action, or agreement by parties to act together.[15] To prove a section 1 violation plaintiffs must present evidence of mutual action, evidence that the union acted at the behest of the defendants and not merely according to an independent course of action.

In examining the record for evidence of an agreement, we recognize that "explicit agreement is not a necessary part of a Sherman Act conspiracy." United States v. General Motors, 384 U.S. 127, 142-43, 86 S.Ct. 1321, 1329, 16 L.Ed.2d 415 (1966). Concurring in Pennington, Justice Douglas emphasized this point:

> "Acceptance by competitors, without previous agreement, of an invitation to participate in a plan, the necessary consequence of which, if carried out, is restraint of interstate commerce, is sufficient to establish an unlawful conspiracy under the Sherman Act."

> Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is declared to be illegal. . . .

15 U.S.C. § 1.

[15] "[Section 1] presents a single concept about common action, not three separate ones: 'contract * * * combination or conspiracy' becomes an alliterative compound noun, roughly translated to mean 'concerted action.' . . . union action alone does not permit an inference of a conspiracy with an employer group:

> Unilaterally, and without agreement with any employer group to do so, a union may adopt a uniform wage policy and seek vigorously to implement it even though it may suspect that some employers cannot effectively compete if they are required to pay the wage scale demanded by the union. The union need not gear its wage demands to wages which the weakest units in the industry can afford to pay. Such union conduct is not alone sufficient evidence to maintain a union-employer conspiracy charge under the Sherman Act. There must be additional direct or indirect evidence of the conspiracy. There was, of course, other evidence in this case, but we indicate no opinion as to its sufficiency.

In South-East Coal, this court was faced with similar factual allegations regarding a conspiracy or agreement between employer and unions and set forth the standard for granting a directed verdict:

> [I]f a plaintiff does not come forth with evidence, when considered in light of opposing evidence, from which a jury could infer the truth of an alleged proposition over its contra-proposition, the plaintiff has not met his burden of proof. When there are equal inferences which can be drawn from a particular set of facts—one inference indicating liability, the other non-liability—it is the judge's obligation at the direct verdict stage of the trial to find for the defendant.

434 F.2d at 777 (footnote and citations omitted) (emphasis added).

Without the excluded hearsay statements, the jury would be left with only the following evidence: a fully lawful collective bargaining agreement existed between the unions and the defendants; the unions attempted to obtain a similar package from the plaintiffs ($2.00 raise over two years); the bricklayers settled with the plaintiffs for $2.00 over two years, while the laborers settled at $3.15 over three years; the defendants hoped and expected that their contract with the unions would set a pattern for the industry;[16] and one of the defendants, Mr. Dailey, director of the AGC, sent a telegram to the unions

---

[16] On direct examination by the plaintiffs, Mr. Dailey, a defendant and president of the AGC, testified:

> [plaintiffs' attorney]
>
> Q. Was it your belief at the time that the other unions with whom you had not negotiated would follow the pattern set in this multi-bargaining?
> [Mr. Dailey]
> A: I'm sorry, was it our belief that the other unions would follow the pattern set?
>
> Q: The unions not included here would follow the pattern that was established during the course of that bargain?
> A: We had no idea whether the other unions would follow the other pattern but I think everybody at the table realized since all construction bargaining is pattern bargaining that there would be a great precedent set by this settlement that in effect would form a pattern for subsequent bargaining and it was the hope of everybody there that the trades and the employer associations not represented in that multi-trade session would consider it as a pattern and not exceed it by any great amount of money, because if they had we wouldn't have been able to get our settlement ratified.

Also, Mr. Veighey, a defendant negotiatior for CEC, testified in a deposition that was read into the record at trial:

>
> "Q: Do you recall any members of the employer group, employer representatives raising a similar type of question as to the impact on multi-trade bargaining if any of the unions settled with other employers who were not represented in different terms?
> "A: No, I don't recall any employer representative making any comment to that extent at all. The general feeling in the meeting from the outset was one of pretty good faith. I sat in on a lot of negotiations and I never experienced the attitude that seemed to be prevalent at this meeting, rather a certain amount of sincerity both on the management side and the union side all through the meeting. Even though we were in disagreement on subjects but the employers did not make any kind of comment.

following the unions' settlement with the plaintiffs asking for a meeting regarding the unions' settlement with plaintiffs. [17]

"Q: My question is: How did good faith relate to your not bringing this matter up to the union?

"A: I suppose because we kind of trusted them. They would try to do their thing and we definitely were going to try to do ours.

"Q: You trusted them to do it?

"A: To do whatever they were going to do in negotiations. Apparently a plateau had been established in every year of negotiations that we ever met. We always had some number out there somewhere by somebody to look at, some carry over contract or something. One of the union fellows, I don't know who it was, but one of them, anyhow, came from this side of the table and made the comment that it would establish a plateau and that was not out of line, so far as I am concerned, because in other years we had faced other plateaus, common language in our industry.

"Q: You say this would establish a plateau. Would this plateau mean in labor terminology basis for settlement with other employers?

"A: At least it was something to aim at. They could go higher than that if they wanted to. They could do whatever they wanted to in their negotiations. I guess we were trusting each other, we would try to encourage more people to come into future multi-trade bargaining. That is why, good faith does have some reference to the whole thing.

* * * * * *

"Q: Do you mean you were trusting them not to settle with other employer groups on better and different terms?

"A: Just trusting them not to upset the apple cart in whatever area they would do it."

Trial Transcript at 1024-27.

[17] The telegram was sent by Mr. Dailey to Jack Wood, secretary and business manager of the Detroit Building Trades Council (an association of construction unions), on May 25, 1970 shortly after the DMAC settled with the union for $3.00 over 3 years. It stated:

"We request a special meeting of the negotiating committee, parties to the multi-trade agreement. We suggest that the committee meet at the Detroit Building Trades Office on Wednesday, May 27th at 2:00 P.M. Subject is the recent . . . settlement

Evidence that the unions sought the same wages from two sets of employers is not sufficient to prove a conspiracy between the unions and one employer group. The unions could have been pursuing the wage scale because of an agreement with defendants; however, it would be at least equally probable to a reasonable jury that the unions were pursuing their own policy, unilaterally reached, that they would not jeopardize their standing with their memberships by agreeing to less favorable conditions for the remaining members of the union than those which they had already negotiated in collective bargaining with defendants. Such a policy, adhered to by the unions, cannot and ought not stand as evidence of an unlawful conspiratorial agreement. There must be, to evidence such an agreement, some other facts from which the jury could properly conclude to the contrary. This requirement, though subtle, is critical to any proper accommodation of the nation's labor and antitrust laws. Otherwise, every union adherence to a bargaining position which had previously been successful in earlier negotiations could make the union and the employer subject to liability under antitrust laws for what was a fully lawful collective bargaining stance.

The evidence could have convinced a rational jury that the defenants hoped their settlement with the unions would set a pattern in the industry. It is not surprising that defendants would not want to be competitively injured by the collective bargaining agreement and would hope possible competitors would not be able to obtain labor at a cheaper rate. Of vital concern to all businesses is their competitive position vis a vis the rest of the industry.[18] In Ramsey v. United Mine Workers, 481 F.2d 742 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 414 U.S. 1067, 94 S.Ct. 576, 38 L.Ed.2d 473 (1973), our court confronted the argument that an agreement with the unions could be inferred because the employers had a competitive motive to standardize wages throughout the indusry:

> As regards any inference to be drawn from a competitive motive on the part of [the defendant employers group], . . . it is apparent that in a competitive economy a competitive motive will be universal to all coal producers. To draw an inference of antitrust conspiracy from this motive would be somewhat of an anomaly.

481 F.2d at 746. In the present case, plaintiffs brought out no admissible evidence that defendants' "concern" regarding future wage settlements with other units was ever communicated to the union. The evidence showed that defendants expected the settlement to set the pattern, but it could not be used by a jury to reach the conclusion that the union agreed or conspired with defendant to help set the wage scale.

Admittedly, we are concerned by the telegram sent by defendant Dailey to the unions following plaintiffs' contract settlement with the unions. This is the only evidence that links what otherwise would be two independent parties pursuing [18] Labor law commentators have also indicated that in the reality of collective bargaining employers always have a concern about the wages their competitors pay. Professor St. Antoine writes: "it is simply unrealistic to insist that an employer has no valid interest in the union wage scale to be paid by the employer's competitors." St. Antoine, supra, note 12, 62 U.Va.L.Rev. at 610. In the same vein, Professor Leslie commented: "it is virtually inevitable that the bargaining process will include at least some discussion of whether the union intends to demand a uniform wage rate from all employers." Leslie, supra, note 12, 66 U.Va.L.Rev. at 1209 n.89. In the instant case, the evidence indicated that the defendants were concerned about setting a pattern, but there was no evidence that they presented this to the union.

their own interests: the unions hoping to obtain equal treatment for all their members and the defendants hoping not to be competitively injured by the bargaining agreement. Plaintiffs assert that defendants would want a meeting with the unions following the plaintiffs' agreement with the unions only if the unions had breached a prior agreement with defendants regarding the wages that the unions would seek. We are not convinced, however, that this telegram, when added to the evidence of a completely legal pattern of bargaining by its union, is enough additional evidence to allow a jury to find an agreement. In making this determination, we find it important that there was no evidence that the meeting proposed in the telegram ever took place; that the evidence showed the defendants had a legitimate concern whether the unions' settlement with plaintiffs would affect ratification of the pact reached by unions and defendants; and that the telegram was sent after, not before, the union negotiated with defendants. We disagree with plaintiffs' contention that a jury could find a conspiracy based on evidence of pattern bargaining and an after-the-fact telegram, to which a response was never made.

Assuming arguendo that there was sufficient evidence of an agreement, we are equally convinced that the directed verdict should be affirmed on the alternate, independent ground that plaintiffs failed to produce sufficient admissible evidence on the second element of their antitrust claim, predatory intent. The trial judge ruled:

> About the competition, I don't think you have enough to go to the jury that there was any intent on anyone's part to harm the Plaintiffs as a group. . . . I certainly don't find any motivation or intent on the part of any of these people to hurt anybody from a competitive point of view.

Trial Transcript at 1174-75.

Although Mr. Snyder, one of the plaintiffs, testified he had been upset with the defendants because of prior collective bargaining experiences, the evidence did not show any ill will on the part of the defendants, or any intent to drive plaintiffs out of business. As evidence of defendants' bad intent, plaintiffs only point to the testimony of defendant Veighey. Mr. Veighey stated that, during the collective bargaining between the defendants and the unions, the employers had caucused and discussed the possible impact of the wage package on employers who were not represented during the bargaining.[19] Mr. Veighey's testimony certainly would support a finding

[19] In a deposition that was read into the record Mr. Veighey stated:

[plaintiffs' attorney]

"Q: You mean you were discussing among yourselves what might happen if employer groups who were not present might settle for different periods of time at different amounts?

"A: No.

"Q: What do you mean by evaluation? What were you trying to evaluate with regards to groups that were not there?

"A: Frankly, we did not want to hurt anybody. We did not want to set up some sort of a situation that would hurt somebody.

"Q: What do you mean? How could the situation you were setting up hurt someone else?

"A: Well, as history indicates, there were employers that did not agree with our settlement.

"Q: At that time until the caucus in terms of what you were discussing, how could what you did hurt someone else?

"A: We came to the conclusion that it would. We came to the conclusion because we were establishing a new concept of bargaining and everything that that contract had in it, arbitration, everything else and to pay the price that we had to pay to get that contract, plus faced with a carry over contract for a greater amount, we did not think we could do any better on our own or we did not think that others could, at least it was our opinion that others could not do any better on their own.

"Q: Is it fair, then, to say you came to the conclusion that that particular agreement would be good for the other employer groups as well as your own?

"A: It was our sincere hope that our decision would do that, right."

that defendants considered other employers, but this very limited proof is far from sufficient to support an inference that defendants wanted to drive plaintiffs out of business. Rather, Mr. Veighey said that defendants discussed the other employers because they did not want to hurt those employers by the wage pattern which might be set. There is simply no evidence in the record from which a reasonable jury could reach a different conclusion regarding defendants' motive or intent.

The record could support a finding that defendants' reason for standardizing wates was to protect the multi-trade/multi-employer bargaining concept. If unions or employers signed more attractive agreements after the multi-trade/multi-employer agreement had been agreed to, this would jeopardize ratification of the earlier pact and might discourage parties from participating in further multi-trade negotiating. This concern with the bargaining structure of the industry is very different from the predatory intent alleged in Pennington and presents few of the competitive dangers. Our analysis of the Pennington case and the standard of antitrust liability set forth later by the courts convince us that bare proof of an intent to protect multi-trade bargaining cannot be the basis for imposing antitrust liability.

On appeal and cross appeal, the judgment of the district court is affirmed.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
FOR THE EASTERN DISTRICT OF MICHIGAN
SOUTHERN DIVISION

Civil Action No. 34664

JAMES R. SNYDER CO., INC., et al.,

Plaintiffs

v.

THE ASSOCIATED GENERAL CONTRACTORS OF AMERICA, et al.,

Defendants

ORAL OPINION OF JAMES P. CHURCHILL,
UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE
November, 1979

THE COURT: I'm not going to try to keep you in suspense too long but I do want to comment for the record upon the nature of the proceedings and very briefly upon the unfortunate, in some way, delay which has occurred.

I think talking about justice delayed is justice denied, I don't think it's totally true but it is extremely unfortunate when it takes ten years to decide an important lawsuit. Sometimes the litigants themselves and the nature of the litigation is responsible. I really think the litigants and lawyers here are not responsible. I think the causes of it lie somewhat in the history of the court, somewhat the court's fault and somewhat not.

I think that this is a logical result of the problem, the process that used to be the policy of this court of passing tough cases down from judge to judge to judge and I am the fifth judge that got this case and I got it some four and a half years ago or five years ago and we are just resolving it now and the principal reasons for the four years or four and a half year-delay after I got it was well there were really two reasons, one, it was a year or so it was involved in an appeal, I don't remember how long but there was an interim appeal, but really the essential thing was I had so many long, hard criminal cases.

It was only in the last year or so I have been able to face up to trying civil cases but I really feel that it is unfortunate that it has been so long and I think the changes are taking place that this type of delay is unlikely to ever occur in this court. I hope that is the case.

I don't mean every case is going to be tried the next day, a case like this naturally will take two or three years to work out properly but that is when it should be decided, two or three years afterwards, not nine years but it is done.

Notwithstanding the long delay it has been an excellently prepared, well-tried lawsuit up to this point. I really feel that I have to make fact findings in the first instance. I just feel it's my duty and I must make them although all of the elements are not the same, I don't have to get involved in some of the detailed elements so much but I do think the Court must determine whether or not there was a conspiracy to do certain things or an agreement between the employers or some of them and the unions or some of them to put a restriction on the economic bargaining with the plaintiffs and if so who were the participants in it.

I don't think there is any question there was a conspiracy or an agreement between somebody; whether it's a conspiracy in the illegal sense of the word I'm not going to express an opinion at the moment but there had to be for this chain of events, there must have been some kind of agreement or meeting of the minds between union people or this could not have occurred. I don't think there is any question. I'm satisfied by a preponderance of the evidence that when the Detroit Mason Contractors Association sat down with the bricklayers and the material workers, the laborers unions that there was underlying that a feeling of commitment by the union people that they were obligated to hold out. I don't think that it would have occurred quite the same way it did and there wouldn't have been quite that hard a position taken by them unless they felt a commitment to somebody.

THE COURT: (Continuing) The real question is who was that commitment to and with, and essentially, in the final analysis, you have a group of defendants or some of them parties to such an agreement. That is one real distinct possibility. There are two bits, two or three things that indicate that is a possibility, is that it is definitely in the interest of the Associated General Contractors and the CEC to have the union hold in their mind, they wanted this concept to work, but that is common sense, there is nothing wrong with wanting it to work. Then there is a statement made by the union people, and I believe it occurred and I don't remember the names, but I do believe that some one or two of the union people told Mr. Snyder—I believe this to be credible—that they said they were committed to the AGC.

But I also think it is a very strong possibility that there was a commitment, either as between the bricklayers and the laborers or even more likely, even though it may not be logical to somebody else, it is extremely likely that that night that the union representatives, when they were caucusing, saw that they were taking a political gamble, a big risk in going back to their people, and I haven't any doubt at all but what they discussed in that meeting and they had arrived at a meeting of the minds to hold the line, that they entered into an agreement with the AGC and the CEC and what have you, that they agreed between themselves to hold the line.

I don't think there is any question at all that the employer group that night were concerned with what would happen. I don't think they were really concerned with a lower price contract—the union people might have been—because I don't really see where a lower contract would hurt them, and I don't know that much about the economics of a construction business, but a lower price to the DMCA, a lower labor rate would help them in future negotiations temporarily in the competitive market. Anytime your supplier has a chance of getting something cheaper, you have a chance of getting it cheaper yourself and making some money. There is no reason in the world—unless you have a cost plus, I don't think they would raise the price in a cost plus, because they would in the long run kill themselves. There was really interest in that group.

The most damaging evidence of all, and I don't think we will ever know what happened, that there was a meeting of the minds, was Mr. Dailey's contract. I don't know what occurred; I could guess what occurred if his lawyer ever found out about it, but with his lawsuit pending, about the existence of a contract—of a telegram like that, that is what I meant, with a lawsuit pending over alleging a conspiracy to call a meeting with your alleged co-conspirators and ask why the hell did you do something that we allegedly didn't expect you to do, would be pretty damn damaging, if you pardon the expression, and I would say this, that I think there is enough evidence, if all of this evidence is in, to take that issue to the jury, I think the jury could find that there is such a conspiracy, at least with some of the defendants.

I am not sure how far—I haven't tried to analyze it that far as to which of all of the Defendants or which of all of the Plaintiffs would remain in, and I am extremely sympathetic of the good faith that this lawsuit has been pursued but, gentlemen, I do not find as a fact that there was such a conspiracy. I am just not convinced myself by a preponderance of the evidence. I recognize it as one, real possibility. I think there are equal possibilities, but the problem you have here is that self interest and expectation of what somebody will do is so completely consistent with what happened that what occurred did not have to have an expressed agreement between these two groups. There are two big groups, they are somewhat hostile groups, they don't trust each other, they have to live with each other. I don't think they can swing that kind of conspiracy on balance, so I do not find as a fact that there was an agreement between the employer groups and the union groups that the unions would not enter into an agreement at a different economic package. I think there is a strong expectation and, as I say, Mr. Dailey's telegram causes me to have some concern but weighed against all the other facts, I do not find that to be a fact. And if you take that out, then under the Enright case the most damaging evidence that could go to the jury comes out with it and it would have to be a directed verdict.

Recognizing, however, there is a possibility that Enright will be further modified or another Court may say I am wrong or that you will convince me on a motion for a rehearing that I am wrong in this respect, I think it is desirable to go on and make some further fact findings, that is what I think the evidence could—that there is enough evidence to go to the jury. I am not going to put this over in terms of law.

For example, I think there is evidence, if we consider all this together, of the conspiracy; that if I don't strike the certain evidence under Enright, even though I don't find the facts myself, I believe a jury could come to a different conclusion and I would give it to the jury, the issue of whether or not there was a conspiracy.

It would also be a fact issue as to which of the Defendants would have been involved in it. If there is a conspiracy, it must have occurred at the table that night and, therefore, I think there would be enough to go to the jury with respect to all persons who sat at that table that night and their respective organizations and companies that they represent, because while Mr. Dailey was there in a capacity as spokesman for the CEC, he was also there for the AGC and he was also there for R. E. Dailey Company, he was there for Thomas E. Dailey, and that is probably true with some of the others, so if on the issue of who was involved, if there is enough to go to the jury, I would find as a fact there is enough to go to the jury on the conspiracy issue as to each of the Defendants.

About the competition, I don't think you have enough to go to the jury that there was any intent on anyone's part to harm the Plaintiffs as a group. I don't think they were particularly interested in the Plaintiff as the groups had been, they were invited to come in and they are going to look after themselves. The CEC invited the Detroit Mason Contractors to come into this thing and if they didn't, the devil take the hindpost, they can take care of themselves.

They weren't particularly concerned with the self—with the interest of J. R. Snyder and Ebling and Hicks and so forth except as they could—they were concerned that it would be in their self-interest because it might help make the whole thing go, but I certainly don't find any motivation or intent on the part of any of these people to hurt anybody from a competitive point of view. It doesn't make sense that a group of general contractors want to drive any mason contractors out of business. They need them. If they want to get rid of the mason contractors, all they have to do is hire them and hire the bricklayers themselves. There is nothing in the world that requires, that I could tell from the others in this case, a general contractor to hire—to subcontract the mason work. They must find it to be efficient and in their self-interest to do so, so they do hire, they do subcontract, but certainly there is no reason in the world that Mr. Dailey or anyone else wanted to harm or entered into any kind of an agreement for the purpose of harming the mason subcontractors, let alone drive them out of business.

I think that Mr. Snyder's concern was real that he was going some day to get wrapped up into some kind of a contract that would hurt him on jurisdictional disputes and they were operating under different economic conditions and they surely didn't want to get wrapped up with the carpenters and so on, and his concern was very real, but that doesn't mean that was the motive of Mr. Dailey and his group.

While I would let it go to the jury on the one issue I would not let it go to the issue of harm if you convince me either driving him out of business or causing him some kind of a harm was a necessary element, but that is what I mean is the question of law and the question of fact. I don't mean to decide the question of law at the moment, because I have to direct the verdict because of the previous decision.

As far as the Plaintiffs are concerned, if I did let this go to a jury, it would only be with respect to the group of Plaintiffs that, and if harm—I really wou'd have to say that we know so little about the economic circumstances of this group that are not within this sub-class that we defined on the record of full time providing material, that I would probably dismiss the case out against the members of the class who would not fall into that full-time category.

Were the objects of the conspiracy successful? Well, not totally and perfectly. Somebody broke the line a little bit on the three-year contract, but I think there is an issue there that could go to the jury. And was harm caused, did they, in fact, have to bargain for more? Could the Plaintiffs, could the Detroit Mason Contractors have settled for less than a dollar? I haven't any idea.

I went a long ways and I allowed Mr. Snyder's opinion to come in simply because it is probably the best evidence in the world. I doubt there is anybody in the world that has a better, realistic idea what they could settle for unless it was the union people on the other side of the table. It is like saying who would have won the ballgame last night if he pitched the low ball instead of a high ball. I did knowingly let that evidence in and I would let that issue to the jury, too, if we were going to go to the jury.

I am sure that if I took this and went in my office for a week and wrote an opinion I could say the things that I have said with much greater clarity, but I thought it has been long enough, it was time for me to decide this and I can sincerely say to you I didn't know until this afternoon which way I was going to decide, but one of the hardest things that a judge has to learn is how do you decide facts. Well, if you can't decide them, if you don't know, you decide them against the party who has the burden of proof; it is as simple as that. I don't know to this day whether there was a conspiracy between these people or not, but the plaintiff has the burden of showing it in order to get the evidence in. He has failed to satisfy me by even the slightest preponderance. At best, the evidence is equal and, therefore, the evidence is suppressed, the motion for a directed verdict is granted.

On Petition For A Writ Of Certiorari To The United States Court Of Appeals For The Sixth Circuit

RESPONDENTS' BRIEF IN OPPOSITION

Respondents respectfully request that this Court deny the Petition For Writ Of Certiorari seeking review of the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals decision in this case because there are no special or important reasons for granting certiorari according to the considerations governing review on certiorari as set forth in Rule 17 of the rules of this Court.

DECISIONS BELOW

Petitioners commenced this action in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Michigan, Southern Division, on March 26, 1970, claiming that Respondents violated Section 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. §1 by allegedly entering into an agreement with certain building trades unions to impose a collectively bargained wage scale on Petitioners with intent to drive Petitioners out of business.

Summary judgment was granted as to certain named defendants prior to trial and was affirmed on appeal. Snyder, et al. v. Edward Rose and Sons, et al., 546 F.2d 206 (6th Cir. 1976).

Trial commenced before a jury on October 3, 1979. At the conclusion of plaintiffs' proofs the District Court granted Respondents' motion for directed verdict on the grounds that there was insufficient evidence on which reasonable minds could deliberate and find for petitioners (Appendix B hereto). Petitioners appealed to the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals and the Sixth Circuit affirmed the decision of the District Court. James R. Snyder Company, Inc., et al. v. Associated General Contractors of America, et al., 677 F.2d 1111 (6th Cir. 1982), Appendix A hereto.

JURISDICTION

The Judgment of the Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit was entered on April 29, 1982. The Petition For Certiorari herein was filed within ninety (90) days thereof. Jurisdiction of this Court is asserted under 28 U.S.C. §1254(a).

QUESTIONS PRESENTED

The questions presented by the Petition For Certiorari are as follows:

1. Whether the courts below erred in holding that under the Federal Rules of Evidence out-of-court statements of alleged co-conspirators would be admissible to prove the existence of an unlawful conspiracy only if, in ruling on the admissibility of the evidence, the trial court finds that a conspiracy is established by a preponderance of the evidence; and
2. Whether in a case where a union seeks to impose a collectively bargained wage scale on one group of employers, allegedly pursuant to an agreement with another group of employers, proof of anti-competitive purpose (i.e., predatory intent) is required to establish an antitrust violation.

STATUTES INVOLVED

Section 1 of the Sherman Act:

> "Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is declared to be illegal." 15 U.S.C. §1.

Section 4 of the Clayton Act:

> "Any perron who shall be injured in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws may sue therefor in any district court of the United States in the district in which the defendant resides or is found to have an agent, without respect to the amount in controversy, and shall recover threefold the damages by him sustained, and the cost of suit, including a reasonable attorney fee." 15 U.S.C. §15.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

This is an anti-trust action grounded on an alleged violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act, 15 U.S.C. §1. Essentially, Petitioners claim that Respondents entered into a collective bargaining agreement with certain construction trade unions in 1970, covering wage rates and fringe benefits, and that Respondents conspired with certain unions to impose the same wage rates and fringe benefits upon Petitioners for the purpose of forcing Petitioners and the class they represent out of business (J.A. 22A, 29A).[1] Respondents deny entering into any conspiracy with anyone to impose any wage rates and fringe benefits upon Petitioners and the class they represent (J.A. 33A-44A, 1469A, B-1579A - B-1581A). Respondents contend that the unions engaged in collective bargaining with Petitioners' collective bargaining representative and acted unilaterally and without agreement with Respondents in seeking the same wages and fringe benefits from Petitioners as the unions had negotiated with Respondents. At the close of Petitioners' proofs, the District Court granted Respondents' Motion For Directed Verdict on the grounds that Petitioners had failed to present evidence on which reasonable minds could deliberate and find a conspiracy (J.A. 71A).

Petitioners commenced this action by filing of their initial Complaint on March 26, 1970 (J.A. 2A). The case proceeded to trial on Petitioners' Amended Complaint filed on August 6, 1970 (J.A. 22A). Petitioners, and the class they represent, are masonry contractors in the building construction industry (J.A. 23A). Respondents are contractors, and contractors' trade associations, engaged in general building construction (J.A. 35A-37A).

The Amended Complaint alleges that on February 16, 1970, Respondents, in the course of multi-employer/multi-union collective bargaining, agreed with the unions upon a wage and fringe benefits package amounting to $2.00 for two years (J.A. 28A-29A). Petitioners claim that Respondents then conspired with the Laborers and Bricklayers Unions to have said Unions impose the same wage and fringe benefit settlement upon Petitioners and the class they represent (J.A. 29A).

Trial commenced before a jury on October 3, 1979. Petitioners called three witnesses to testify and introduced portions of the deposition testimony of another witness. The witnesses called to testify were James Snyder (J.A. 739A-1105A) and Robert Ebeling (J.A. B-1582A - C-1589A), who are principals of two of the Petitioner companies, and Thomas Dailey (J.A. 1105A-1470A), one of the Respondents. Petitioners also introduced portions of the deposition testimony of Stanley Veighey (J.A. 1478A - B-1581A), one of the individual Respondents.

Neither witness Snyder nor witness Ebeling was involved in the multi-trade collective bargaining involving Respondents and the various construction trades unions. Subsequent to the multi-trade settlement on February 17, 1970, however, Petitioners entered into collective bargaining, through their collective bargaining representative the Detroit Mason Contractors Association ("DMCA"), with the Laborers and Bricklayers Unions (J.A. 881A-883A). Petitioners attempted to establish the claimed conspiracy by pure surmise and speculation and by Snyder and Ebeling offering nebulous hearsay statements assertedly made by representatives of the Laborers and Bricklayers Unions in the course of collective bargaining with the DMCA (J.A. 883A, 891A, 1075A, C-1576A - C-1578A, C-1582A).

The District Court, over Respondents' objection, received the hearsay testimony of Snyder and Ebeling relative to statements allegedly made by the non-party Union representatives. In conformity with the procedure laid down by the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals in United States v. Vinson, 606 F.2d 149, 153 (6th Cir. 1979), cert. denied, 444 U.S. 1076 (1980), reh. denied, 445 U.S. 972 (1980), the District Court conditionally admitted such statements subject to later demonstration of their admissibility.

At the close of Petitioners' proofs, Respondents moved to strike the hearsay statements of the alleged non-party co-conspirators. The District Court considered all of the evidence, including the hearsay statements, in deciding the preliminary question of admissibility (Appendix A, page 19a, n. 13, 677 F.2d at 1117 n. 13). The court concluded that Petitioners had failed to establish Respondents' participation in the alleged conspiracy "by even the slightest preponderance" of the evidence and thus held the alleged co-conspirator hearsay statements inadmissible. (Appendix B, page 36a.)

The court then concluded that, with the exclusion of the alleged co-conspirator hearsay statements, there was insufficient evidence on which reasonable minds could deliberate and find for Petitioners and granted Respondents' Motion For Directed Verdict (J.A. 71A, 1602A, 1605A).

PRE-1970 COLLECTIVE BARGAINING HISTORY

Beginning with the mid-1950's, the Detroit area building construction industry had been continuously beset by crippling labor strikes (J.A. 1170A). The construction unions' "leapfrogging" approach to collective bargaining resulted in the various trade unions taking the settlement of one union and seeking to better that settlement in subsequent negotiations (J.A. 1095A, 1111A, 1113A). In 1968 the Detroit construction industry was hit with a 10-week strike as a result of failure to reach accord with the various building trades unions (J.A. 822A, 1110A, 1510A). Ultimately, the AGC agreed to a two year settlement providing an aggregate increase of $1.90 per hour (J.A. 1689A-1690A).

THE EVOLUTION OF MULTI-TRADE BARGAINING

The record of collective bargaining in the Detroit area construction industry showed that for upwards of 50 years, and despite numerous strikes, there was no instance in which the unions had agreed to settle for a lesser amount than their demand prior to a strike (J.A. 1175A). Thus, it was clear to many employers that there had to be a better way to conduct the collective bargaining so as to eliminate the need of a strike (J.A. 1175A, 1365A, 1374A-1375A, 1509A-1510A).

The AGC representatives discussed the concept of multi-employer/multi-union collective bargaining with people from other areas of the country who had experience with this format (J.A. 1505A-1507A). The CEC also appointed a ten man committee to explore a better way to conduct collective bargaining (J.A. 1247A, 1253A).

Representatives of the CEC and the AGC met with the Executive-Secretary of the Greater Detroit Building Trades Council in the Spring of 1969 and broached the subject of multi-trade bargaining (J.A. 1246A-1247A, 1375A). In October 1969, the AGC met with those construction trades unions with which it bargained to discuss the concept of multi-trade bargaining (J.A. 1248A-1267A, 1611A-1614A). In November, 1969, a meeting was held with a number of trade unions and construction contractor associations to discuss multi-trade bargaining (J.A. 1268A-1269A, 1536A-1537A). A representative of the DMCA, Petitioners' collective bargaining agent, attended this meeting (J.A. 1269A). Subsequent meetings between the associations affiliated with the CEC and with the various trade unions were held (J.A. 1277A, 1619A) to discuss multi-trade bargaining; and finally, on February 6, 1970, those construction contractor associations and those trade unions who were agreeable to participating in multi-employer/multi-union bargaining agreed to commence multi-trade negotiations, limited to monetary issues only, on February 16, 1970 (J.A. 1304A-1310A, 1629A).

THE 1970 MULTI-TRADE COLLECTIVE BARGAINING

On February 16, 1970, those contractor associations and those building trades unions who had voluntarily agreed to participate in multi-trade bargaining met (J.A. A-1568A). The collective bargaining was limited to a singular matter, the monetary issue, i.e., wage rates and fringe benefit costs (J.A. 1154A, 1159A, 1379A, 1629A). Approximately 16 building trades unions and 24 contractor associations were represented in the multi-trade bargaining (J.A. 1172A, 1187A).

There were a number of carry-over[2] labor contract rates within and without the Detroit area providing $1.00 per hour increases, or more, effective in 1970 (J.A. 1150A, 1164A-1165A, A-1576A - A-1577A). The $1.00 per hour pattern was "set in concrete" (J.A. 1164A) and Mr. Dailey, Chairman of the CEC negotiating committee, was convinced in his own mind that the contractors were going to end up paying a dollar-dollar in 1970 for a two year agreement (J.A. 1199A).

[2] A carry-over rate refers to a wage rate previously negotiated in a multi-year contract which rate was to take effect in 1970.

It was therefore not surprising that the unions' monetary demand presented in the February 16th multi-trade bargaining was a dollar-dollar for the two year agreement. What was unusual was that the unions presented their real settlement number "right out of the box" (J.A. 1176A, 1177A). After some 14-16 hours of marathon bargaining, the parties agreed on a proposed two year agreement providing for monetary (wages and fringe benefits) increases of $.90 per hour effective June 1, 1970, $.15 per hour effective October 1, 1970, and $.95 per hour effective June 1, 1971 (J.A. 849A, 1154A-1155A, A-1585A, 1176A-1177A, 1670A). The contractor negotiators were convinced that this was the best settlement they could make[3] (J.A. 1168A, 1176A, 1178A, 1180A, 1199A, 1341A, 1383A, 1586A).

This proposed agreement was not binding, however, on anyone (J.A. 1183A). Each participating contractor association and each union could either accept or reject the proposed agreement through ratification procedures for its own members (J.A. 1155A, 1359A). The proposed agreement applied only to those contractor associations and unions participating in the multi-trade bargaining (J.A. 1213A, 1222A, 1229A, B-1579A - B-1581A).

The proposed agreement was significant in that the unions agreed not to strike in the event of impasse on bargaining working conditions with the individual contractor associations, but to submit such disputes to binding arbitration (J.A. 845A-850A, 1640A-1641A).

[3] Petitioners assert the "Respondents discussed how the Agreement would 'hurt' Petitioners and others" (Petition For Writ Of Certiorari, page 5). As noted by the Sixth Circuit, the record in fact shows that "[R]ather, Mr. Vehighey said that defendants discussed the other employers because they did not want to hurt those employers by the wage pattern which might be set" (Appendix A, page 27a; 677 F.2d at 1125).

THE DMCA'S COLLECTIVE BARGAINING WITH LABORERS AND BRICKLAYERS IN 1970 AFTER THE MULTI-TRADE BARGAINING

James Snyder, Chairman of the DMCA labor negotiating committee, learned of the multi-trade settlement on February 17, 1970, while he was in Chicago (J.A. 839A). This action was commenced shortly thereafter on March 26, 1970 (J.A. 2A).

In 1970 the DMCA acted as the collective bargaining agent for those masonry contractors who were members of the DMCA, among which were Petitioners (J.A. 803A-804A, 807A, 1685A). The DMCA negotiated collective bargaining agreements only with the Laborers and Bricklayers Unions, the principal crafts employed by its member contractors (J.A. 779A, 805A, 807A). The Laborers and Bricklayers also negotiated collective bargaining agreements with various contractor associations who participated in the multi-trade bargaining, and these unions thus participated with said contractor associations in the multi-trade bargaining (J.A. 1640A-1641A). The DMCA had been invited to participate in the multi-trade bargaining but declined the invitation (J.A. 1262A).

The proposed agreement reached on February 17, 1970, in the multi-trade bargaining was not binding on the DMCA (J.A. 1213A, 1222A, 1229A, B-1579A - B-1581A). The DMCA thus entered into collective bargaining negotiations with the Laborers and Bricklayers in May and June of 1970, some sixty (60) days after the multi-trade bargaining (J.A. 868A). The Bricklayers Union proposed the same monetary settlement it made with the contractor associations participating in the multi-trade bargaining (J.A. 878A-879A). Witness Snyder testified that the Bricklayers Union representative stated that "there was no way possible that they [the Union] could change from the agreement they made with the multi-bargaining group" and that "they [the Union] couldn't accept any more or any less" (J.A. 880A). The DMCA ultimately settled with the Bricklayers Union for the same monetary settlement which the Bricklayers received in the multi-trade bargaining (J.A. 882A).

The Laborers Union presented the DMCA with a monetary demand of $2.00 for two years (J.A. 883A). Snyder testified that Willie Carter, one of the Laborers Union negotiators, stated that "he made his agreement with the General Contractors . . . and that is the way it was going to be" (J.A. 883A). Snyder also testified that Mr. Gionatti, another Laborers Union negotiator, "made it very clear with me he made an agreement with AGC and would not go back on it" (J.A. 891A).

The Laborers Union and the DMCA reached an impasse in their negotiations and a three week strike ensued (J.A. 883A-884A). The DMCA and the Laborers ultimately settled for a three year contract with an aggregate monetary increase of $3.15 per hour (J.A. 884A).

On May 25, 1970, Thomas Dailey, President of the CEC, sent a telegram to the Secretary of the Detroit Building Trades Council requesting a meeting for May 27th with the negotiating committees for the parties to the multi-trade agreement, stating "subject is the recent settlement of a contract between Detroit Mason Contractors Association and Laborers Local 334, Local 1076" (J.A. 1420A-1421A). No such meeting, however, took place (J.A. 1435A). Dailey testified that he sent the telegram because the DMCA settlement could establish a carry-over pattern for 1972-1973 (the multi-trade agreement expired on June 1, 1972) and he wanted to determine whether this would have any effect on those unions who had not yet acted to ratify the multi-trade settlement with those contractor associations participating in the multi-trade bargaining (J.A. 1426A-1427A, 1431A-1432A, 1438A).

REASONS FOR DENYING THE WRIT

There is here present no special and important reason for review of the Sixth Circuit's decision measured against the considerations governing review on certiorari as set forth in Rule 17 of the rules of this Court. The Sixth Circuit affirmed the judgment of the District Court on two (2) alternate, independent grounds. Firstly, that Petitioners failed to produce sufficient evidence of a conspiracy to violate the anti-trust laws on which reasonable minds could deliberate and find for the Petitioners. Secondly, that Petitioners failed to produce sufficient evidence of any anti-competitive purpose to harm Petitioners' businesses. As stated by the Sixth Circuit, the "evidence consisted almost entirely of actions which are permitted under the nation's labor laws". Appendix A, page 1a; 677 F.2d at 1112.

Petitioners seek to portray this case as one of precedential significance. It is clearly not such a case. The District Court and the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals simply applied established legal principles to an undisputed factual record in disposing of a twelve year old case which had no basis in fact.

I.

THE COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE SIXTH CIRCUIT AND THE DISTRICT COURT CORRECTLY APPLIED THE FEDERAL RULES OF EVIDENCE IN DETERMINING THE ADMISSIBILITY OF HEARSAY STATEMENTS ATTRIBUTED TO ALLEGED CO-CONSPIRATORS.

In support of their contention that Respondents entered into an agreement with the unions to impose the wage scale negotiated with Respondents upon the Petitioners, the Petitioners sought to put into evidence two hearsay statements assertedly made to Petitioners' collective bargaining representative by union representatives. Respondents made timely objection to the admission of such statements. The District Court, however, conditionally admitted the statements in evidence. At the close of Petitioners' proofs Respondents made a motion to strike the alleged co-conspirator out-of-court statements on the grounds that such statements were inadmissible because Petitioners had failed to establish the existence of a conspiracy by a preponderance of the evidence as required by the Sixth Circuit's holdings in United States v.

Enright, 579 F.2d 980 (6th Cir. 1978), and United States v. Vinson, supra.

The District Court considered the totality of the evidence, including the hearsay co-conspirator statements, and determined that the evidence was insufficient to establish the existence of the alleged conspiracy "by even the slightest preponderance". Accordingly, the District Court ruled that the co-conspirator hearsay statements were inadmissible and granted Respondents' motion to strike.[4] After striking the hearsay co-conspirator statements, the District Court concluded that there was insufficient evidence on which reasonable minds could deliberate and find a conspiracy and granted Respondents' motion for directed verdict (Appendix B, pages 36a).

Petitioners contend that in deciding the preliminary issue as to the existence of a conspiracy, in ruling on the admissibility of hearsay co-conspirator statements, the trial court should apply a "prima facie" evidence standard rather than a "preponderance of the evidence" standard. Petitioners' argument in this regard is unsupported by any citation of authority or by sound reasoning.

Prior to adoption of the Federal Rules of Evidence (effective July 1, 1975), the general rule was that co-conspirator hearsay testimony was admissible to prove the existence of a conspiracy if the trial court determined there was sufficient independent, non-hearsay evidence to establish a prima facie case of conspiracy.[5] United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683, 701,

[4] Petitioners have not contended that the District Court's factual determination was clearly erroneous. Appendix A, page 19a, n. 13; 677 F.2d at 1121 n. 13.

[5] Significantly, a return to the prima facie evidence standard and proof of the existence of a conspiracy by independent, non-hearsay evidence, as a condition for admitting hearsay statements, would avail Petitioners nothing in this case. The District Court found that the independent, non-hearsay evidence of conspiracy was insufficient to withstand a motion for directed verdict (Appendix B, pages 33a); and Petitioners make no claim that such finding is clearly erroneous. Appendix A, page 19a, n. 13; 677 F.2d at 1121, n. 13.

n. 14 (1974); United States v. Petrozziello, 548 F.2d 20, 23 (1st Cir. 1977); South-East Coal Company v. Consolidation Coal Company, 434 F.2d 767,788 (6th Cir. 1970); United States v. Enright, supra, 579 F.2d at 983.

Section 801(d)(2)(E) of the Federal Rules of Evidence provides that a statement is not hearsay if made "by a co-conspirator of a party during the course and in the furtherance of the conspiracy". The plain language of the rule imports that establishment of the existence of a conspiracy is a condition prerequisite to admitting the co-conspirator statement. Rule 104(a) of the Federal Rules of Evidence provides that preliminary questions concerning "the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court". Thus, the trial court must determine whether there is sufficient evidence to establish the existence of a conspiracy as part and parcel of the determination of the admissibility of the out-of-court co-conspirator statement.

In United States v. Enright, supra, the Sixth Circuit addressed the impact of the Federal Rules of Evidence on the issue of admission into evidence of out-of-court co-conspirator statements to prove the existence of a conspiracy. The court concluded that the obligation of the trial court to determine preliminary questions of admissibility of evidence and considerations of basic reliability and fairness, imposes a greater duty upon the trial court than simply to satisfy itself that a prima facie case of existence of a conspiracy exists. The Sixth Circuit stated that it aligned itself with the holding and logic of the First Circuit in United States v. Petrozziello, supra, 548 F.2d 20, that even in a criminal case the ordinary civil standard (i.e., preponderance of the evidence) should be applied in determining the existence of a conspiracy as a condition of admitting out-of-court co-conspirator statements.

Subsequent to its decision in Enright, supra, the Sixth Circuit ruled in United States v. Vinson, supra, 606 F.2d 149, that under Rule 104(a), Federal Rules of Evidence, the trial court may consider out-of-court co-conspirator statements to establish the existence of a conspiracy in deciding the preliminary question of admissibility. Under this extremely liberal holding, hearsay co-conspirator statements may lift themselves by their own bootstraps to the level of competent evidence. Glasser v. United States, 315 U.S. 60, 74-75 (1942); Appendix A, page 12a, n. 8, 677 F.2d at 1117, n. 8.[6]

Petitioners argue that the plaintiff in a civil case should not be held to the same standard for determination of the admissibility of out-of-court co-conspirator statements as applies in a criminal case (i.e., proof of existence of a conspiracy by a preponderance of the evidence) under United States v. Enright, supra. Such argument is unsupported by any citation of judicial or other authority, or by reason. Apparently the argument is premised on the false notion that the rationale for applying the preponderance of the evidence test in Enright is simply that the trial court should not be held to the same standard in determining the preliminary question of admissibility as is a jury in determining guilt or liability. As stated by the Sixth Circuit, however, in this case —

> "... Enright was based upon this court's construction of the Federal Rules of Evidence rather than upon notions of criminal law or procedure. Except as constitutional considerations or statutes otherwise require, the same rules apply to civil and criminal cases. See Fed. R. Evid. 1101(b)." Appendix A, page 11a; 677 F.2d at 1117. Emphasis added.

Petitioners' argument that differing standards should be applied in criminal and civil cases for determining preliminary questions of the admissibility of evidence flies in the face of the clear mandate of the Federal Rules of Evidence, 1101(b).

Applying the preponderance of the evidence test to the preliminary determination of the existence of a conspiracy does

[6] Most Circuit Courts of Appeals permit the trial court to only consider evidence of the existence of a conspiracy independent of the out-of-court co-conspirator statements. 1 Weinstein's Evidence, ¶ 104[05], pp. 164-45, 164-46, n. 30.

not, as contended by Petitioners, usurp the fact-finding function of the jury. The Sixth Circuit's explanation of the fallacy in such contention leaves nothing to be said:

> "It is argued that a preponderance of the evidence test usurps the function of the jury to determine whether a conspiracy exists. This has surface appeal until it is remembered that what is involved here is a ruling on the admission or exclusion of particular evidence, and on this question only. As with all such judicial decisions on admissibility, the effect upon the outcome may be profound, but this comes from the ruling itself and not from the manner in which the law requires the trial judge to make it." Appendix A, page 11a-12a; 677 F.2d at 1117. Emphasis added.

The holding of the Sixth Circuit, that the out-of-court statements of the alleged co-conspirators would be admissible to prove the existence of an unlawful conspiracy only if, as a preliminary matter, the District Court found a conspiracy by a preponderance of the evidence, is in accord with the Federal Rules of Evidence and well settled law.

II.

THE HOLDING OF THE SIXTH CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, THAT ANTI-COMPETITIVE PURPOSE (i.e., PREDATORY INTENT) IS NECESSARY TO ESTABLISH AN ANTI-TRUST VIOLATION ARISING FROM AN ALLEGED AGREEMENT BETWEEN A UNION AND EMPLOYERS TO ESTABLISH AN INDUSTRY-WIDE WAGE SCALE, IS IN ACCORD WITH THE DECISIONS OF THIS COURT AND IS NOT IN CONFLICT WITH THE DECISION OF ANOTHER COURT OF APPEALS.

In the Amended Complaint filed in this cause the Petitioners alleged that Respondents had violated Section 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. §1, by combining and conspiring with certain labor unions, as follows:

> "... Agreed that the terms of the multi-trade bargaining agreement herein set forth and, more particularly, the wage and fringe benefit provisions should be imposed upon the Plaintiffs herein, with the purpose and intent of forcing the Plaintiffs and the class they represent out of business." Paragraph 11A of Amended Complaint.[7] Emphasis added.

In his opening statement to the jury, counsel for the Petitioners stated that —

> "[Mr. Cohen] However, we will also show that when that agreement was made, the AGC and the general contractors knew what they were doing would be ruinous to our business, that they, the AGC and the general contractors, intended it to be ruinous to our business and that, in fact, they did have what is referred to as a predatory [purpose] that at least one of the purposes was hurting the members of our association." Transcript of Hearing, October 9, 1979.

At the conclusion of the Petitioners' proofs the District Court concluded that the evidence failed to demonstrate "any intent on anyone's part to harm" the Petitioners in their business (Appendix B, page 33a). Accordingly, the District Court stated that it would not have let the case go to the jury on the matter of intent to harm Petitioners in their business (Appendix B, page 34a).

The Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals, in affirming the District Court, held —

> "... that plaintiffs in the present case had the burden of proving first that defendants and unions agreed to impose wages upon plaintiffs, and second that defendants entered into the agreement with the intent to injure the plaintiffs' businesses, i.e., with predatory intent." Appendix A, page 18a; 677 F.2d at 1121.

[7] See also Appendix A hereto, pages 2a, 12a; 677 F.2d at 1113 and 1118.

Having failed to present evidence to support their allegations that Respondents agreed with the unions to impose their negotiated wage agreement upon Petitioners with predatory intent, Petitioners now erroneously claim that proof of predatory intent is not here required to establish a violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. §1.

Petitioners' assertion that the holding of the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals, requiring proof of predatory intent in the circumstances of this case, is in conflict with the decision of the Third Circuit Court of Appeals in Muko, Inc. v. Southwestern Pennsylvania Building And Construction Trades Council, 670 F.2d 421 (3rd Cir. 1982), petition for cert. filed, _____ U.S. _____, 50 U.S.L.W. 3804 (No. 81-1798, Mar. 26, 1982), is patently feckless.

In Muko, supra, a restaurant owner entered into an agreement with building trades unions to use union represented contractors to build its restaurants in order to cause the unions to cease picketing its restaurant. Muko, a non-union contractor, claimed that the agreement was a group boycott and a per se violation of the Sherman Act. The trial court rejected Muko's contention that the agreement between the restaurant owner and the unions gave rise to a per se violation of the Sherman Act and instructed the jury to apply the rule of reason. The jury found that although the agreement was outside the labor exemption to the anti-trust laws, it was not an unreasonable restraint of trade and the trial court entered judgment for the defendants.

On appeal Muko claimed that the trial court erred in failing to instruct the jury to apply the per se standard for determining an anti-trust violation and in instructing the jury on the relevant product market. The Third Circuit rejected both contentions and affirmed the District Court. The court stated that there was no evidence of anti-competitive purpose in that the defendants did not wish "to gain an advantage over Muko in an economic or competitive sense" and held that the per se rule of unreasonableness was not applicable. Muko, supra, 670 F.2d at 432.

The Muko case, supra, is inapposite to the instant case on its face and there is plainly no conflict between the holding of the Third Circuit in that case and the holding of the Sixth Circuit in the instant case. In fact, the two decisions are in complete harmony in their rejection of the notion that the per se rule of unreasonableness should be applied in every labor anti-trust case in which the labor exemption is found inapplicable.

The Third Circuit stated, as follows:

> "... We thus cannot agree with Muko, who contends that every labor anti-trust case in which the labor exemption is found to be inapplicable should be held illegal under the per se standard." Muko, supra, 670 F.2d at 426.

Petitioners' contention that the holding of the Sixth Circuit in this case is in conflict with the legal posture of the Third Circuit in similar cases is completely refuted by even a cursory reading of Consolidated Express, Inc. v. New York Shipping Association, 602 F.2d 494, 515-516 (3rd Cir. 1979), reversed and remanded on other grounds, 448 U.S. 902 (1980). In Consolidated Express, supra, the Third Circuit stated that where anti-trust liability is asserted with reference to an agreement concerning subjects at the very heart of the collective bargaining process, as is the situation in the instant case, liability is limited "to cases where predatory intent can be shown",[8] according to the teachings of this Court's decision in United Mine Workers of America v. Pennington, 381 U.S. 657 (1965). The Third Circuit, moreover, expressly noted its agreement with the Sixth Circuit's construction of this Court's holding in Pennington that proof of predatory intent is required to establish an anti-trust violation on facts such as are here involved.[9]

[8] Consolidated Express, supra, 602 F.2d at 516.

Petitioners' assertion that the holding of the Sixth Circuit requiring proof of predatory intent in the case sub judice is in conflict with the decisions of this Court in Ramsey v. United Mine Workers of America, 401 U.S. 302 (1971), and United Mine Workers of America v. Pennington, 381 U.S. 657 (1965), is likewise erroneous.

In Pennington, the Court addressed the issue of whether an alleged agreement between a union and a group of employers to impose a collectively bargained wage agreement on employers outside the bargaining unit, with intent to drive the latter out of business, violated the Sherman Act. In deciding the case the Court divided into three groups, each composed of three Justices. Mr. Justice White wrote the Court's opinion and Mr. Justice Douglas wrote a concurring opinion (Mr. Justice Black and Mr. Justice Clark concurring), giving the construction of Mr. Justice's White's opinion. Mr. Justice Goldberg, with whom Mr. Justice Harlan and Mr. Justice Stewart joined, dissented from the opinion.

In construing the Court's opinion, Mr. Justice Douglas formulated the issue in the case to be submitted by instruction at retrial, stating:

> "... On the new trial the jury should be instructed that if there were an industry-wide collective bargaining agreement whereby employers and the union agreed on a wage scale that exceeded the financial ability of some operators to pay and if it was made for the purpose of forcing some employers out of business, the union as well as the employers who participated in the arrangement with the union should be found to have violated the anti-trust laws." Pennington, supra, 381 U.S. at 672-673. Emphasis added.

[9] Ibid.

As noted in Smitty Baker Coal Co. v. United Mine Workers of America, 620 F.2d 416, 428 (4th Cir. 1980) cert. denied 449 U.S. 870 (1980):

> "Mr. Justice Douglas' construction of Mr. Justice White's opinion and his statement of the circumstances under which an antitrust violation against the Union could be found has been considered a proper summarization of the decision of the court in Pennington..."[10]

On remand of Pennington, supra, 381 U.S. 657, the Sixth Circuit concluded that this Court's holding required proof of anti-competitive purpose (i.e., predatory intent) to establish an anti-trust violation involving an alleged agreement to impose a negotiated wage scale on non-bargaining unit employers. Lewis v. Pennington (Pennington II), 400 F.2d 806, 814 (6th Cir. 1968), cert. denied, 393 U.S. 983 (1968), rehearing denied, 393 U.S. 1045 (1969). As noted by Judge Edwards in Ramsey v. United Mine Workers of America, 416 F.2d 655, 661 (6th Cir. 1969), reversed and remanded on other grounds, 401 U.S. 302 (1971), this Court's denial of certiorari in Pennington II, supra, 400 F.2d 806, cannot be discounted. The Court remanded Pennington, supra, with instructions for retrial. If the trial court, or the Sixth Circuit, had incorrectly construed this Court's holding in Pennington, supra, as requiring proof of predatory intent, it is difficult to believe the Court would have ignored the error and denied certiorari in Pennington II, supra.

In Ramsey v. United Mine Workers of America, 416 F.2d 655 (6th Cir. 1969), (en banc), reversed and remanded on other grounds, 401 U.S. 302 (1971), the Sixth Circuit reaffirmed its construction of this Court's holding in Pennington, supra, 381 U.S. 657 (1965), that proof of predatory intent is required to establish an anti-trust violation founded on an alleged agreement to impose a negotiated wage scale on employers outside the bargaining unit.[11] The Sixth Circuit, however, divided evenly on whether the elements of the asserted anti-trust violation had to be established by "clear proof" or by a "preponderance of the evidence". This Court granted certiorari and held that the "preponderance of the evidence" standard should be applied in determining whether the union had committed an anti-trust violation. Ramsey v. United Mine Workers of America, supra, 401 U.S. 302 (1971). The Court expressly declined to reconsider its holding in Pennington, supra, 381 U.S. 657, and did not indicate that the Sixth Circuit's constuction of Pennington, relative to the requirement for proof of predatory intent, was in error.

The holding of the Sixth Circuit that, in the circumstances here present, proof of predatory intent is necessary to establish an anti-trust violation, is in complete accord with the decisions of this Court and of every Court of Appeals having occasion to address the issue. Petitioners' tortured misconstruction of the decisions of this Court, and of the Third Circuit, to suit their own purpose does not provide appropriate grounds for granting certiorari.

CONCLUSION

This case is one in which the Petitioners simply failed to produce evidence sufficient to establish an alleged conspiracy in violation of the anti-trust laws. There is here presented no conflict with the decision of another Court of Appeals on the same matter, no important question of federal law which should be settled by this Court, and no conflict with applicable decisions of this Court. The Petition For Writ Of Certiorari should be denied.

UNITED STATES
COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE SIXTH CIRCUIT

James R. Snyder Company, Inc., Ebeling & Hicks, Inc., Clarence Gleeson, Inc., and Leon J. Vendervennet & Sons, Inc.,
Plaintiffs-Appellants
Cross-Appellees

v.

Associated General Contractors of America, Detroit Chapter, Inc., Barton-Malow Co., Darin & Armstrong, Inc., R. E. Dailey & Co., Thomas E. Dailey, A. Z. Shmina & Sons Co., Detroit Building Employers Labor Council, Stanley E. Veighey, John W. Lanzetta, Frank D'Agostino and John McCoy, Defendants-Appellees
Cross-Appellants

Decided and Filed April 29, 1982.

Before: Edwards, Chief Judge, Engel, and Martin, Circuit Judges.

Engel, Circuit Judge. Among numerous issues raised in these cross-appeals is a significant question concerning the application of the Federal Rules of Evidence, as they affect admission of coconspirators' out-of-court statements, and the extent to which our circuit's construction of these rules in criminal prosecutions applies also to civil litigation. Equally important these appeals require us to consider the difficult issue of the sufficiency of the evidence of an alleged illegal antitrust conspiracy, where that evidence consisted almost entirely of actions which are permitted under the nation's labor laws. Upon consideration of these and other issues, we affirm a judgment entered by the district court following direction of a jury verdict in favor of the defendants.

Plaintiffs are independent masonry contractors in Detroit, Michigan. They are also members of the Detroit Mason and Construction Association (DMCA). DMCA members employ bricklayers and laborers in the metropolitan area of Detroit. Since 1958, the DMCA has negotiated labor agreements on behalf of its members and other masonry contractors with unions representing both the bricklayers and laborers.

The defendants, the Associated General Contractors of America (AGC), Detroit Chapter, Inc., the Detroit Building Employers Labor Council (also known as the Construction Employers Council) (CEC), and various members and officers of those organizations, entered into a multi-trade/multi-employer labor agreement[1] which had the effect of establishing wage rates and fringe benefits for construction workers in the metropolitan Detroit area. In their complaint, plaintiffs alleged that defendants had conspired with the unions which had participated in the multi-trade/multi-employer agreement to impose the terms of that agreement upon smaller nonsignatory employers in an attempt to drive them out of business. Plaintiffs claimed that this conduct violated section 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1 (1976). Plaintiffs sought treble damages and injunctive relief under sections 4 and 16 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 15 and 26 (1976).

Trial commenced before a jury, but at the conclusion of the plaintiffs' proof the district court entered a directed verdict in favor of the defendants. The district court held that the plaintiffs had failed as a matter of law to establish a prima facie case for relief under the Sherman Act. The plaintiffs appeal, claiming that the trial judge improperly excluded from evidence certain out-of-court statements by alleged coconspirators which tended to prove an illegal agreement existed. They also claim that the evidence was sufficient to submit the issues to the jury regardless of whether the out-of-court statements were admitted into evidence. The defendants cross-appeal from the trial court's denial of their motion to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction under the Sherman Act.

I.

Because it raises the issue of subject matter jurisdiction, we first address the cross-appeal. Defendants contend that plaintiffs failed to prove that the alleged agreement restrained "trade or commerce among the several states..." 15 U.S.C. § 1. Defendants properly assert that without proof of such interstate effects Sherman Act jurisdiction would be lacking.

At the jurisdictional hearing held prior to trial by the district court, plaintiffs presented evidence in an attempt to show that their activity as masonary contractors, while not directly in interstate commerce, substantially affected interstate commerce. Because defendants' alleged antitrust violations altered plaintiffs' interstate activities, plaintiffs argue that defendants' illegal acts served as a basis for Sherman Act jurisdiction. At the close of the proofs submitted during the jurisdictional hearing, the district court found that plaintiffs engaged in no masonry work outside the State of Michigan, or at least they would not be bound by the terms of any labor contract negotiated in Michigan if they were to do so.[2] It therefore concluded that plaintiffs' businesses were not directly in interstate commerce for the purposes of this litigation.

[2]The uncontroverted evidence showed that had the plaintiffs engaged in masonry construction out-of-state, in Toledo, Ohio, for example, plaintiffs would be required to pay the wage rates and fringe benefits which prevailed in the Toledo area.

Because Sherman Aact jurisdiction exists not only when activities are in interstate commerce but also when activities have an effect on interstate commerce, see McLain v. Real Estate Board of New Orleans, 444 U.S. 232, 242 (1980), the district court continued its factual determination and found that plaintiffs acquired between fifteen and twenty-five percent of their prime commodity, bricks and masonry products, from outside Michigan. It further found that as a result of the monetary settlement contained in the multi-trade/multi-employer labor agreement, plaintiffs later had to accept labor contracts with the bricklayers and laborers which provided wages and fringe benefits in excess of what they otherwise would have had to pay; that the plaintiffs lost business due to the need to increase their bid prices on construction projects to cover the high labor costs they incurred as a result of the new labor contract; and that because plaintiffs were less successful in securing construction projects, they purchased fewer bricks and other masonry products from out of state.

The district court also found, however, that the total demand for masonry work in the Detroit area was not affected by the wage scale paid to bricklayers and laborers. Therefore, any work lost by plaintiffs was gained by other masonry contractors. Because plaintiffs' competitors also purchased bricks and masonry products from out of state, the same amount of those materials continued to flow into the State of Michigan from interstate commerce, and any work lost by plaintiffs was gained by others.

The defendants relied upon a number of cases in which it has been held that the mere substitution of purchasers of goods from interstate commerce confers no jurisdiction under the Sherman Act. See Page v. Work, 290 F.2d 323, 332 (9th Cir. 1961), cert. denied, 368 U.S. 875 (1961); Dominion Parking Corp. v. B & O Railroad, 450 F.Supp. 441, 446 (E.D. Va. 1978). The rationale of those decisions was the interstate commerce was not substantially affected since the same amount of supplies still flowed into the state.

The district court below, however, relied upon Lehrman v. Gulf Oil Corp., 464 F.2d 26 (5th Cir. 1972), in finding that the plaintiffs had established jurisdiction under the Sherman Act. In Lehrman, a single Gulf service station in Texas sued Gulf for treble damages under the Sherman Act, alleging that Gulf's complicated system of setting wholesale prices for its gasoline was used as a mechanism for fixing the retail prices at which dealers resold Gulf gasoline. Because the vast majority, if not one hundred percent, of the gasoline sold by Gulf to Lehrman was produced in the State of Texas, Gulf asserted that Lehrman had not shown jurisdiction under the Sherman Act. The Fifth Circuit held that since the Lehrman service station also sold tires, batteries and accessories which were manufactured outside of Texas, and since there was a reduction in Gulf's interstate purchase of those items even if the absolute volume of such purchases remained constant in Texas after Lehrman went out of business, a sufficient nexus with the interstate commerce existed.

We agree with the district court that the Sherman Act has sufficient reach to touch the activities here. That reach has been held to extend as far as Congress' constitutional power to regulate interstate commerce. Gulf Oil Corp. v. Copp Paving Co., 419 U.S. 186, 201 (1974). Whatever questions may have existed concerning Sherman Act jurisdiction where there has been a substitution of purchasers of goods from interstate commerce, they no longer exist after the more recent decisions of the Supreme Court on this subject.

In Hospital Building Co. v. Trustees of Rex Hospital, 425 U.S. 738 (1976), the plaintiff alleged that the defendants were engaged in an unlawful conspiracy to restrain trade in the furnishing of medical and surgical hospital services and that they were attempting to monopolize the hospital business in Raleigh, North Carolina. The district court dismissed petitioner's amended complaint on the pleadings, finding no Sherman Act jurisdiction. The Fifth Circuit, sitting en banc, affirmed. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that four of petitioner's allegations supplied the requisite jurisdictional facts. First, petitioner purchased supplies from out-of-state sources. Second, petitioner received revenues from out-of-state insurance firms. Third, petitioner remitted management fees to its out-of-state parent corporation. Fourth, petitioner would borrow from out-of-state lenders to finance some of its planned expansion. The Court found it irrevelant that no out-of-state supplier, insurer, or lender would "go under," or that no market price would be affected.

Later, in McLain v. Real Estate Board of New Orleans, 444 U.S. 232 (1980), the plaintiff's complaint alleged that real estate brokers in the greater New Orleans area had agreed to a fixed rate of brokerage commissions on sales of residential property. This, the plaintiff alleged, was a price-fixing conspiracy in violation of section 1 of the Sherman Act. The district court dismissed the complaint for failure to establish the interstate commerce component of Sherman Act jurisdiction. The Fifth Circuit affirmed. Again, the Supreme Court reversed. The Supreme Court held that the plaintiff need only allege an interrelationship between the intrastate activity which was the target of the unlawful conduct and a specified aspect of interstate commerce. If those allegations were converted, the plaintiff must then prove that the defendant's conduct had, as a matter of practical economics, a not insubstantial effect on the interrelated activity which was demonstrably in interstate commerce. In McLain, the interrelated activity was alleged to have been the involvement of out-of-state suppliers, insurers, lenders and the out-of-state parent corporation. There was no suggestion in McLain that it was necessary to show that the aggregate amount of supplies, insurance or financing from interstate sources would have been diminished by the alleged unlawful activity.

The facts here are parallel to those alleged in McLain. Plaintiffs alleged that there had been a conspiracy to require conformance with a fixed rate of labor. A substantial amount of products which were involved in plaintiffs' businesses was purchased from out of state. Plaintiffs' purchases of those products decreased as a result of the defendants' conduct. Therefore, the targeted activity (labor) was shown to have been interrelated with a specific aspect of interstate commerce (purchase of out-of-state products), and defendants' conduct was shown to have had a not insubstantial effect on plaintiffs' purchases of those products from interstate commerce. It was not necessary that plaintiffs further show that their out-of-state suppliers would "go under," or that the market price for such goods in interstate commerce would be affected. Nor was it necessary to show a decrease in the interstate flow of those products into the State of Michigan.[3]

II.

In support of their contention that defendants entered into an agreement with the unions to set a wage scale for the entire industry, plaintiffs attempted to put into evidence two out-of-court statements made to plaintiffs by union negotiators. The first statement was made by Carlo Martino, the chairman of the bricklayers' union executive committee. James R. Snyder testified that during the bricklayers' labor contract negotiations with the DMCA, Martino told plaintiffs Vandervennet and Snyder that:

> they really like our offer that we made but there was no way possible that they could change from the agreement they made with the multi-bargaining group, the contract they signed, that they were stuck with that.

[3]We are aware that a conflict exists between the circuits regarding McLain. The Ninth Circuit has held that Sherman Act jurisdiction exists when any business activity of a defendant affects interstate commerce. Western Waste Service v. Universal Waste Control, 616 F.2d 1094 (9th Cir. 1980). Under a more conservative view of the reach of the Sherman Act, the Tenth Circuit has taken the position that a defendant's illegal activities must affect interstate commerce for jurisdiction to be present. In the instant case, because the evidence supports a finding that defendants' alleged illegal actions affected interstate commerce, we need not decide whether Sherman Act jurisdiction could be founded solely on proof that defendants' general business activity affects interstate commerce.

Trial Transcript at 253. The second statement was made by bargaining agents for Laborers' Locals 334 and 1076, to the effect that they had "made an agreement with A.G.C. and would not go back on it." Trial Transcript at 264. Defendants made timely objections to the admission of these statements on the ground that they were hearsay, and plaintiffs responded that the statements were admissable under Federal Rule of Evidence 801(d) (2) (E),[4] as statements of coconspirators made in the course of and in furtherance of a conspiracy. Although these statements were conditionally admitted, the trial court eventually refused to consider them as being properly in evidence because the plaintiffs had not proven the existence of a conspiracy by a preponderance of the evidence, as required under United States v. Enright, 579 F.2d 980 (6th Cir. 1978).

In Enright, the defendant was charged with criminal conspiracy. There was "extensive evidence" that an illegal conspiracy existed, but the prosecution offered out-of-court statements by alleged coconspirators to prove Enright's longstanding role in it. The issue was what standard of proof of conspiracy and of the defendant's connection to it would permit such statements to be admitted into evidence under Federal Rule of Evidence 801(d) (2) (E). The court held that the trial judge must be convinced by a preponderance of the evidence that a conspiracy existed and the defendant participated in it before such statements were admissable.

Plaintiffs contend that since Enright was a criminal conspiracy case, the district court erred in applying the preponderance of the evidence standard to this civil case. Plaintiffs argue that one consideration in Enright which led to the adoption of the preponderance of the evidence standard was the desire to prevent the trial judge from usurping the jury's ultimate fact-finding function while ruling on the admissibility of evidence. Following logically from this, plaintiffs assert, the less stringent prima facie should be employed by the trial judge in ruling on the admissibility of conconspirators' statements in civil conspiracy cases because the jury uses the preponderance of the evidence standard in fulfilling its ultimate fact-finding function.

Before adoption of the Federal Rules of Evidence, case law in this circuit held that out-of-court statements by alleged coconspirators were admissible in civil conspiracy cases upon a prima facie showing by independent evidence that a conspiracy existed and that the defendant was connected with it. South-East Coal Co. v. Consolidated Coal Co., 434 F.2d 767, 779 (6th Cir. 1970), cert. denied, 402 U.S. 983 (1971). The preliminary question of the admissibility of this evidence was a matter for the judge, not the jury, to decide. Id. at 788. The adoption of the Federal Rules, however, has brought about significant changes in this area. First, as this court held in United States v. Enright, supra, the prima facie test is too lenient a standard to be employed under the Rules. This holding primarily resulted from the court's resolution of the question whether Rule 104(a),[5] or Rule 104(b),[6] applies to the admissibility of coconspirator's out-of-court statements. Rule 104(a) provides that preliminary questions of admissibility shall be

[5]Fed R. Evid. 104 (a) provides:

> Questions of admissibility generally. Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

[6]Fed. R. Evid. 104 (b) provides:

> Relevancy conditioned on fact. When the relevancy of evidence depends upon the fulfillment of a condition of fact, the court shall admit it upon, or subject to, the introduction of evidence sufficient to support a finding of the fulfillment of the condition.

determined by the trial court, while Rule 104(b) deals with preliminary questions of admissibility when the relevancy of the evidence depends upon the fulfillment of a condition of fact. Finding the question "to be more one of basic reliability and fairness of admitting the evidence rather than a relevancy question. . .," the court concluded that "a fair reading of subsections (a) and (b) favors the construction that 104(a) should be applicable to the question of the admissibility of a co-conspirator's statements." 579 F.2d 984.

Because the court in Enright viewed Rule 104(b) "as a classic restatement of the prima facie test," 579 F.2d 984, it was led to the conclusion that:

> the framers of 104(a), whatever else they may have intended, probably did not intend that the trial judge employ a prima facie test in resolving issues arising under that subsection. A determination under 104(a) is more demanding than a prima facie test and calls for the exercise of judicial fact-finding responsibilities by the trial judge, responsibilities which require him to evaluate both credibility and the weight of the evidence.

579 F.2d 985 (footnote omitted). Recognizing that the fact-finding responsibilities of the judge and jury are distinct, the court adopted the preponderance of the evidence, rather that the reasonable doubt standard.

Also, since the decision in South-East Coal Company, this circuit has done away with the requirement that the conspiracy's existence and the defendant's participation therein be shown only by independent evidence. The out-of-court statements themselves now may be used to convince the trial judge of the conspiracy's existence and the defendant's participation in it. United States v. Kendricks, 623 F.2d 1165, 1168 n.5 (6th Cir. 1980); United States v. Vinson, 606 F.2d 149, 153 (6th Cir. 1979). Vinson, as a practical matter, makes the preponderance standard easier to meet when presenting evidence to the trial judge on preliminary matters.

These post-Rules decisions lead us to the conclusion that the preponderance of the evidence standard should be used to determine the admissibility of out-of-court statements by alleged coconspirators in civil as well as criminal cases. Enright was based upon this court's construction of the Federal Rules of Evidence rather than upon notions of criminal law or procedure. Except as constitutional considerations or statutes otherwise require, the same rules apply to civil and criminal cases. See Fed R. Evid. 1101(b).[7] Use of the preponderance standard in civil conspiracy cases provides a uniform standard for determining admissibility of coconspirators' declarations in both civil and criminal contexts. See Sessions & Hall, The Coconspirator's Statement: Evaluating Preliminary Questions of Admissibility Under Rule 801(d)(2)(E), 11 St. Mary's L.J. 83, 112 (1979); Comment, The Impact of Federal Rule of Evidence 104 on the Coconspirator Exception to the Hearsay Rule, 28 Emory L.J. 1115, 1133 (1979).

It is argued that a preponderance of the evidence test usurps the function of the jury to determine whether a conspiracy exists. This has surface appeal until it is remembered

[7]Fed. R. Evid. 1101 (b) provides:

> (b) Proceedings generally. These rules apply generally to civil actions and proceedings including admiralty and maritime cases, to criminal cases and proceedings, to contempt proceedings except those in which the court may act summarily, and to proceedings and cases under the Bankruptcy Act.

It could be argued that the burden of proof for admissibility in a civil case should be less than that in a criminal case, because the civil defendant is not exposed to the risk of loss of liberty and, hence, has a lesser need for protection from incompetent evidence. This argument, however, misunderstands the basis for the Enright decision. In Enright, we were first guided by an interpretation of Rules 104(a) and 104(b) in reaching the conclusion that the Rules had eliminated the prima facie standard for preliminary questions of competency. We only then determined that use of the preponderance standard in making these evidentiary decisions would satisfy constitutional concerns which might arise in criminal cases. U.S. v. Enright, supra, 579 F.2d at 984-85. Enright thus illustrates that the issue is primarily one of interpreting the Federal Rules of Evidence, rather than considering the burdens of proof required for the substantive issues in the case.

that what is involved here is a ruling on the admission or exclusion of particular evidence, and on this question only. As with all such judicial decisions on admissibility, the effect upon the outcome may be profound, but this comes from the ruling itself and not from the manner in which the law requires the trial judge to make it.[8]

Thus we agree with the district judge that the statements of the alleged coconspirators would be admissible to prove the existence of the illegal conspiracy only if, as a preliminary matter, the district judge found a conspiracy by a preponderance of the evidence.

III.

A.

In their complaint, plaintiffs alleged that defendants had conspired with the bricklayers' and laborers' unions to impose the multi-trade/multi-employer collective bargaining agreement's terms upon smaller non-signatory employers in an attempt to drive them out of business in violation of section 1 of the Sherman Act. By seeking to apply antitrust laws to an agreement reached under provisions of the labor law,[9] plaintiff's complaint illustrates and raises questions of an inevitable basic tension between two firmly established national policies. On the one hand, labor law favors collective bargaining and agreements limiting competition for labor. Antitrust law, on the other hand, promotes competition and declares illegal those agreements which unreasonably restrict commerce. To reconcile these conflicting policies and to protect unionism and collective bargaining from destruction under the guise of antitrust law enforcement, both Congress and the courts have created exemptions to antitrust law for labor activity.[10] Although some areas of the antitrust-labor interface may remain unclear, the Supreme Court in United Mine Workers v. Pennington, 381 U.S. 657 (1965) addressed allegations substantially the same as those made by plaintiffs in the present case and refined the scope of the labor exemptions.

[8] By applying Enright to civil litigation, we do not diminish the value of the coconspirator's statements in proving the existence of a conspiracy since, as Vinson makes clear, the coconspirator's statements may be considered by the trial judge in making the evidentiary determination. Moreover, if admitted, those statements may make the other evidence on the existence of a conspiracy more credible to the jury.

[9] In multi-employer/multi-union bargaining, the employers agree to bargain as a group, as do the unions. The duty to bargain in this type of arrangement has been enforced by the National Labor Relations Board under section 8(b)(3) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(b)(3). See, e.g., Local 260, Wood, Wire and Metal Lathers International Union, 228 NLRB No. 179 (1977).

In Pennington, a small coal company alleged that the UMW had agreed with a multi-employer group of large mineowners to cooperate in a variety of tactics to drive smaller coal companies out of business. In furtherance of this purpose, the UMW agreed with the multi-employer group to establish a uniform wage rate for all coal companies, a rate higher than that which the small companies could afford. The UMW argued that this agreement was exempt from the antitrust laws because it dealt with wages, a mandatory subject of bargaining under labor law. Justice White, in the opinion of the Court, rejected this argument and stated:

[10]The "statutory" exemption was created by Congress in sections 6 and 20 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 17 and 29 U.S.C. § 52, and in the Norris-La Guardia Act, 29 U.S.C. §§ 101 et seq. This exemption can only be asserted by a labor organization itself and will be lost if the union combines or conspires with a non-union group to restrain trade. See, e.g., Allen Bradley Co. v. Local No. 3, IBEW, 325 U.S. 797 (1945). The "non-statutory" exemption was created by the Supreme Court to exempt agreements between unions and employers. These agreements are not exempt under the statutory exemption because the unions are not acting unilaterally, but the Court has concluded that they should be exempt nevertheless as "a proper accommodation between congressional policy favoring collective bargaining under the NLRA and the congressional policy favoring free competition in business markets." Connell v. Plumbers and Steamfitters Local 100, 421 U.S. 616, 322 (1975). Because defendants in the present case are not labor organizations, they could not assert the statutory exemption. Employers, however, as well as labor unions, have successfully raised the nonstatutory exemption for provisions arising from collective bargaining. See McCourt v. California Sports, Inc., 600 F.2d 1193 (6th Cir. 1979); Mackey v. National Football League, 543 F.2d 606, 612 (8th Cir. 1976), cert. dism'd., 434 U.S. 801 (1977).

> [W]e think a union forfeits its exemption from the antitrust laws when it is clearly shown that it has agreed with one set of employers to impose a certain wage scale on other bargaining units. One group of employers may not conspire to eliminate competitors from the industry and the union is liable with employers if it becomes a party to the conspiracy. This is true even though the union's part in the scheme is an undertaking to secure the same wages, hours or other conditions of employment from the remaining employers in the industry.

381 U.S. at 665-66. Similarily, in the instant case plaintiffs' allegation that defendants agreed with unions to impose a wage scale upon plaintiffs would, if proved, prevent the use of a labor exemption by defendants.

In Federal Maritime Commission v. Pacific Maritime Association, 435 U.S. 40 (1978), the Supreme Court cautioned that the question of antitrust liability must be analyzed separately from that of non-exemption:

> It is plain from our cases that an antitrust case need not be tried and a violation found before a determination can be made that a collective-bargaining agreement is not within the labor exemption, just as it is clear that denying the exemption does not mean that there is an antitrust violation.

435 U.S. at 61 (footnote omitted) (emphasis added). Thus, although proof of an agreement between defendants and the unions to impose a wage scale on plaintiffs would eliminate any claim of a labor exemption from the antitrust laws, a determination of the elements of an antitrust violation requires further analysis.

This court has considered the antitrust implications of extra-unit wage agreements in a series of cases involving the coal industry.[11] Following the Supreme Court's decision in Pennington, we had our first occasion to address the requirements for proof of antitrust liability in Lewis v. Pennington (Pennington II), 400 F.2d 806 (6th Cir. 1968). Judge Peck examined the opinions of Justices White and Douglas, and concluded that the Sherman Act made illegal "a conspiracy between employers and labor formed with the intention of driving competitors out of business . . . ." 400 F.2d at 814 (emphasis added). Later in Ramsey v. United Mine Workers (Ramsey I), 416 F.2d 655 (6th Cir. 1969) (en banc), rev'd on other grounds, 401 U.S. 302 (1971), the court split evenly on the issue whether elements of the antitrust violation had to be established by "clear proof." The opinions of Judge Edwards and Judge O'Sullivan, however, both quoted Judge Peck from Pennington II regarding predatory intent, and neither opinion expressed any disagreement with this need for a showing of anticompetitive purpose. 416 F.2d at 655 and 673. In South-East Coal Co. v. Consolidation Coal Co., 434 F.2d 767 (6th Cir. 1970), cert. denied, 402 U.S. 983 (1971), we summarized our prior decisions in Pennington II and Ramsey I regarding antitrust liability that could arise when a labor union has agreed with an employer to impose a wage scale on non-signatory employers:

[11] Pennington v. United Mine Workers (Pennington I), 325 F.2d 804 (6th Cir. 1963), rev'd., 381 U.S. 657 (1965); Lewis v. Pennington (Pennington II), 400 F.2d 806 (6th Cir. 1968), cert. denied, 393 U.S. 983 (1968); Ramsey v. United Mine Workers (Ramsey I), 416 F.2d 655 (6th Cir. 1969), rev'd., 401 U.S. 302 (1971); Tennessee Consolidated Coal Co. v. United Mine Workers, 416 F.2d 1192 (6th Cir. 1969), cert. denied, 397 U.S. 964 (1970); South-East Coal Co. v. Consolidation Coal Co., 434 F.2d 767 (6th Cir. 1970); Ramsey v. United Mine Workers (Ramsey II), 481 F.2d 742, cert. denied, 414 U.S. 1067 (1973).

> [I]f this agreement was made or entered into by the union in pursuance of its own self interests, there are no grounds for concluding a violation of the antitrust laws. . . . [I]f, however, the employers and union entered into this contract with the conscious knowledge or intent that it would be used to drive competitors out of business (more than the incidental effects caused by the adoption of a uniform wage agreement which may result in certain operators not being able to function profitably), then a violation of the antitrust laws has occurred.

434 F.2d at 782 (emphasis added).

After South-East Coal, the Supreme Court held in Ramsey v. United Mine Workers, 401 U.S. 302 (1971), that the ordinary preponderance standard, rather than clear proof, should be applied in antitrust actions against unions. Although the Court did not specifically address the issue whether predatory intent was a requirement to a finding of antitrust liability, Justice White stated:

> Where a union by agreement with one set of employers, insists on maintaining in other bargaining units specified wage standards ruinous to the business of those employers, it is liable under the antitrust laws for the damages caused by its agreed-upon conduct.

401 U.S. at 313 (emphasis added). Upon remand, the district court stated that the above quoted language from Ramsey I allowed proof of a per se violation without the need to show predatory intent, Ramsey v. United Mine Workers, 344 F.Supp. 1029, 1033 (E.D. Tenn. 1972). On appeal, this court in an opinion by Judge Edwards affirmed the decision that a conspiracy had not been proved, and rejected Ramsey's claim of a per se violation. Ramsey v. United Mine Workers (Ramsey II) 481 F.2d 742 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 414 U.S. 1067 (1973).

Although the dictum of Justice White in Ramsey could conceivably be read broadly enough to substitute harmful effect for predatory intent as an element of the antitrust violation, we decline to do so for a number of reasons. Most important, an elimination of the predatory intent requirement would be inconsistent with the concurring opinion in Pennington, which provided a limitation on the Court's decision. See United Mine Workers v. Pennington, supra, 381 U.S. at 673 (Douglas J. concurring) (requiring that the agreement be made "for the purpose of forcing some employers out of business"); Lewis v. Pennington, supra, 400 F.2d at 814 (holding that a majority of the Supreme Court in Pennington required a finding of predatory intent). There is no other indication in Ramsey, however, that the Court intended to expand the scope of liability that it set forth in Pennington. Moreover, in Ramsey II, we implicitly rejected the idea that a per se antitrust violation could exist based on proof of an agreement but without proof of predatory intent. See P. Areeda and D. Turner, I Antitrust Law 208 n.71 (1978). Where legitimate union agreements with multi-employer groups will always reduce some competition over wages, the requirement of predatory intent is necessary to limit the application of the antitrust laws to truly anticompetitive behavior between firms in an industry.

Other circuits have held that predatory intent is a necessary element for an antitrust violation arising from a union's commitment to employers to establish an industry-wide wage scale. In Smitty Baker Coal Co. v. United Mine Workers, 620 F.2d 416 (4th Cir. 1980), the Fourth Circuit made an extensive review of the decisions of our court and concluded:

> It would appear established beyond controversy by these Sixth Circuit decisions ... that for an agreement between the Union and the multi-employer group to constitute an antitrust violation it must arise out of a predatory intent....

620 F.2d at 431. In addition, the Fifth and Seventh Circuits have required a showing of anticompetitive purpose. Embry-Riddle Aeronautical University v. Ross Aviation, Inc., 504 F.2d 896, 903 (5th Cir. 1974); Associated Milk Dealers, Inc. v. Milk Drivers' Local 753, 422 F.2d 546, 554 (7th Cir. 1970). We also note that many commentators have voiced approval of this requirement.[12]

Therefore, we conclude, after a review of Supreme Court decisions, cases from this circuit and other circuits, and the literature in the antitrust-labor area, that plaintiffs in the present case had the burden of proving first that defendants and unions agreed to impose wages upon plaintiffs, and second that defendants entered into this agreement with the intent to injure the plaintiffs' businesses, i.e., with predatory intent.

As an initial basis for the directed verdict, the district judge held that plaintiffs had not presented sufficient evidence on the first element, the existence of an agreement or conspiracy. Applying Enright (properly, as we have determined in part II of this opinion), the district court excluded the hearsay statements after making a factual finding that appellants had failed to prove the existence of a conspiracy by a preponderance of the evidence.[13] With the Enright statements excluded, the district court determined that a rational jury could not find the existence of an agreement or conspiracy based on the remaining evidence. In an informal ruling from the bench, the district judge concluded that while there may have been proof of a conspiracy or agreement among the union people themselves to negotiate the same wage rate with plaintiffs as had already been obtained from defendants, there was insufficient admissible evidence of any agreement or conspiracy between the unions and defendants to submit that issue to the jury.

> I do not find as a fact that there was an agreement between the employer groups and the Union groups that the unions would not enter into an agreement at a different economic package. I think there is a strong expectation and, as I say, Mr. Dailey's telegram causes me to have some concern but weighed against all the other facts, I do not find [the agreement] to be a fact. . . . [T]hen under the Enright case, the most damaging evidence that could go to the jury comes out with it and it would have to be a directed verdict.

Trial Transcript at 1173. We agree with the trial judge that plaintiffs did not present sufficient admissible evidence on the issue of an agreement between defendants and the unions to avoid a directed verdict.

[13]In making his Enright determination that plaintiffs had not proved a conspiracy or agreement by a preponderance of the evidence, the trial judge followed this court's decision in United States v. Vinson, 606 F.2d 149 (6th Cir. 1979), and properly considered all the evidence, including the hearsay statements. Although plaintiffs have challenged the standard of proof applied by the trial judge, they have not claimed, and we would be unable to hold, that despite applying the proper legal standard the judge's factual determination was clearly erroneous.

By its language, section 1 of the Sherman Act[14] applies to three different types of conduct: contract, combination, or conspiracy. These terms have been interpreted generally to cover concerted action, or agreement by parties to act together.[15] To prove a section 1 violation plaintiffs must present evidence of mutual action, evidence that the union acted at the behest of the defendants and not merely according to an independent course of action.

In examining the record for evidence of an agreement, we recognize that "explicit agreement is not a necessary part of a Sherman Act conspiracy." United States v. General Motors, 384 U.S. 127, 142-43 (1966). Concurring in Pennington, Justice Douglas emphasized this point:

> "Acceptance by competitors, without previous agreement, of an invitation to participate in a plan, the necessary consequence of which, if carried out, is restraint of interstate commerce, is sufficient to establish an unlawful conspiracy under the Sherman Act."

381 U.S. at 673 n.*, quoting Interstate Circuit v. United States, 306 U.S. 208, 227 (1939). Yet it is also true, as Justice White wrote for the Court in Pennington, that mere proof of unilateral union action alone does not permit an inference of a conspiracy with an employer group:

> Unilaterally, and without agreement with any employer group to do so, a union may adopt a uniform wage policy

[14]Section 1 of the Sherman Act provides:

15 U.S.C. § 1.

[15]"[Section 1] presents a single concept about common action, not three separate ones: 'contract * * * combination or conspiracy' becomes an alliterative compound noun, roughly translated to mean 'concerted action.' . . . [T]he core of the classic offense is mutual assent, a mutual commitment to an anticompetitive course, . . ." L. Sullivan, Antitrust 312 (1977).

> and seek vigorously to implement it even though it may suspect that some employers cannot effectively compete if they are required to pay the wage scale demanded by the union. The union need not gear its wage demands to wages which the weakest units in the industry can afford to pay. Such union conduct is not alone sufficient evidence to maintain a union-employer conspiracy charge under the Sherman Act. There must be additional direct or indirect evidence of the conspiracy. There was, of course, other evidence in this case, but we indicate no opinion as to its sufficiency.

381 U.S. at 665 n.2.

In South-East Coal, this court was faced with similar factual allegations regarding a conspiracy or agreement between employer and unions and set forth the standard for granting a directed verdict:

> [I]f a plaintiff does not come forth with evidence, when considered in light of opposing evidence, from which a jury could infer the truth of an alleged proposition over its contra-proposition, the plaintiff has not met his burden of proof. When there are equal inferences which can be drawn from a particular set of facts — one inference indicating liability, the other non-liability — it is the judge's obligation at the direct verdict stage of the trial to find for the defendant.

434 F.2d at 777 (footnote and citations omitted) (emphasis added).

Without the excluded hearsay statements, the jury would be left with only the following evidence: a fully lawful collective bargaining agreement existed between the unions and the defendants; the unions attempted to obtain a similar package from the plaintiffs ($2.00 raise over two years); the bricklayers settled with the plaintiffs for $2.00 over two years, while the laborers settled at $3.15 over three years; the defendants hoped and expected that their contract with the unions would set a pattern for the industry;[16] and one of the defendants, Mr. Dailey, director of the AGC, sent a telegram to the unions following the unions' settlement with the plaintiffs asking for a meeting regarding the unions' settlement with plaintiffs.[17]

Evidence that the unions sought the same wages from two sets of employers is not sufficient to prove a conspiracy between the unions and one employer group. The unions could have been pursuing the wage scale because of an agreement with defendants; however, it would be at least equally probable to a reasonable jury that the unions were pursuing their own policy, unilaterally reached, that they would not jeopardize their standing with their memberships by agreeing to less favorable conditions for the remaining members of the union

[16]On direct examination by the plaintiffs, Mr. Dailey, a defendant and president of the AGC, testified:

[plaintiffs' attorney]

Q: Was it your belief at the time that the other unions with whom you had not negotiated would follow the pattern set in this multi-bargaining?

[Mr. Dailey]

A: I'm sorry, was it our belief that the other unions would follow the pattern set?

Q: The unions not included here would follow the pattern that was established during the course of that bargain?

A: We had no idea whether the other unions would follow the other pattern but I think everybody at the table realized since all construction bargaining is pattern bargaining that there would be a great precedent set by this settlement that in effect would form a pattern for subsequent bargaining and it was the hope of everybody there that the trades and the employer associations not represented in that multi-trade session would consider it as a pattern and not exceed it by any great amount of money, because if they had we wouldn't have been able to get our settlement ratified.

Trial Transcript at 777-78.

Also, Mr. Veighy, a defendant negotiator for CEC, testified in a deposition that was read into the record at trial:

[plaintiffs' attorney]

"Q: Do you recall any members of the employer group, employer representatives raising a similar type of question as to the impact on multi-trade bargaining if any of the unions settled with other employers who were not represented in different terms?

[Mr. Veighy]

"A: No, I don't recall any employer representative making any comment to that extent at all. The general feeling in the meeting from the outset was one of pretty good faith. I sat in on a lot of negotiations and I never experienced the attitude that seemed to be prevalent at this meeting, rather a certain amount of sincerity both on the management side and the union side all through the meeting. Even though we were in disagreement on subjects but the employers did not make any kind of comment.

* * *

"Q: My question is: How did good faith relate to your not bringing this matter up to the union?

"A: I suppose because we kind of trusted them. They would try to do their thing and we definitely were going to try to do ours.

"Q: You trusted them to do it?

"A: To do whatever they were going to do in negotiations. Apparently a plateau had been established in every year of negotiations that we ever met. We always had some number out there somewhere by somebody to look at, some carry over contract or something. One of the union fellows, I don't know who it was, but one of them, anyhow, came from this side of the table and made the comment that it would establish a plateau and that was not out of line, so far as I am concerned, because in other years we had faced other plateaus, common language in our industry.

"Q: You say this would establish a plateau. Would this plateau mean in labor terminology basis for settlement with other employers?

"A: At least it was something to aim at. They could go higher than that if they wanted to. They could do whatever they wanted to in their negotiations. I guess we were trusting each other, we would try to encourage more people to come into future multi-trade bargaining. That is why good faith does have some reference to the whole thing.

* * *

"Q: Do you mean you were trusting them not to settle with other employer groups on better and different terms?

"A: Just trusting them not to upset the apple cart in whatever area they would do it."

[17]The telegram was sent by Mr. Dailey to Jack Wood, secretary and business manager of the Detroit Building Trades Council (an association of construction unions), on May 25, 1970 shortly after the DMAC settled with the union for $3.00 over 3 years. It stated:

> "We request a special meeting of the negotiating committee, parties to the multi-trade agreement. We suggest that the committee meet at the Detroit Building Trades Office on Wednesday, May 27th at 2:00 P.M. Subject is the recent ... settlement of a contract between Detroit ... than those which they had negotiated in collective bargaining with defendants. Such a policy, adhered to by the unions, cannot and ought not stand as evidence of an unlawful conspiratorial agreement. There must be, to evidence such an agreement, some other facts which the jury could properly conclude to the contrary. This requirement, though subtle, is critical to any proper accommodation of the nation's labor and antitrust laws. Otherwise, every union adherence to a bargaining position which had previously been successful in earlier negotiations could make the union and the employer subject to liability under antitrust laws for what was a fully lawful collective bargaining stance.

The evidence could have convinced a rational jury that the defendants hoped their settlement with the unions would set a pattern in the industry. It is not surprising that defendants would not want to be competitively injured by the collective bargaining agreement and would hope possible competitors would not be able to obtain labor at a cheaper rate. Of vital concern to all businesses is their competitive position vis a vis the rest of the industry.[18] In Ramsey v. United Mine Workers, 481 F.2d 742 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 414 U.S. 1067 (1973), our court confronted the argument that an agreement with the unions could be inferred because the employers had a competitive motive to standardize wages throughout the industry:

[18]Labor law commentators have also indicated that in the reality of collective bargaining employers always have a concern about the wages their competitors pay. Professor St. Antoine writes: "It is simply unrealistic to insist that an employer has no valid interest in the union wage scale to be paid by the employer's competitors." St. Antoine, supra, note 12, 62 U. Va. L. Rev. at 610. In the same vein, Professor Leslie commented: "it is virtually inevitable that the bargaining process will include at least some discussion of whether the union intends to demand a uniform wage rate from all employers." Leslie, supra, note 12, 66 U. Va. L. Rev. at 1209 n.89. In the instant case, the evidence indicated that the defendants were concerned about setting a pattern, but there was no evidence that they presented this to the union.

> As regards any inference to be drawn from a competitive motive on the part of [the defendant employers group], ... it is apparent that in a competitive economy a competitive motive will be universal to all coal producers. To draw an inference of antitrust conspiracy from this motive would be somewhat of an anomaly.

481 F.2d at 746. In the present case, plaintiffs brought out no admissible evidence that defendants' "concern" regarding future wage settlements with other units was ever communicated to the union. The evidence showed that defendants expected the settlement to set the pattern, but it could not be used by a jury to reach the conclusion that the union agreed or conspired with defendant to help set the wage scale.

Admittedly, we are concerned by the telegram sent by defendant Dailey to the unions following plaintiffs' contract settlement with the unions. This is the only evidence that links what otherwise would be two independent parties pursuing their own interests: the unions hoping to obtain equal treatment for all their members and the defendants hoping not to be competitively injured by the bargaining agreement. Plaintiffs assert that defendants would want a meeting with the unions following the plaintiffs' agreement with the unions only if the unions had breached a prior agreement with defendants regarding the wages that the unions would seek. We are not convinced, however, that this telegram, when added to the evidence of a completely legal pattern of bargaining by its union, is enough additional evidence to allow a jury to find an agreement. In making this determination, we find it important that there was no evidence that the meeting proposed in the telegram ever took place; that the evidence showed the defendants had a legitimate concern whether the unions' settlement with plaintiffs would affect ratification of the pact reached by unions and defendants; and that the telegram was sent after, not before, the union negotiated with defendants. We disagree with plaintiffs' contention that a jury could find a conspiracy based on evidence of pattern bargaining and an after-the-fact telegram, to which a response was never made.

C.

Assuming arguendo that there was sufficient evidence of an agreement, we are equally convinced that the directed verdict should be affirmed on the alternate, independent ground that plaintiffs failed to produce sufficient admissible evidence on the second element of their antitrust claim, predatory intent. The trial judge ruled:

> About the competition, I don't think you have enough to go to the jury that there was any intent on anyone's part to harm the Plaintiffs as a group. . . . I certainly don't find any motivation or intent on th part of any of these people to hurt anybody from a competitive point of view.

Although Mr. Snyder, one of the plaintiffs, testified he had been upset with the defendants because of prior collective bargaining experiences, the evidence did not show any ill will on the part of the defendants, or any intent to drive plaintiffs out of business. As evidence of defendants' bad intent plaintiffs only point to the testimony of defendant Veighey. Mr. Veighey stated that, during the collective bargaining between the defendants and the unions, the employers had caucused and discussed the possible impact of the wage package on employers who were not represented during the bargaining.[19] Mr. Veighey's testimony certainly would support a finding that defendants considered other employers, but this

[19] In a deposition that was read into the record Mr. Veighey stated:

[plaintiffs' attorney]

"Q: You mean you were discussing among yourselves what might happen if employer groups who were not present might settle for different periods of time at different amounts?

"A: No.

"Q: What do you mean by evaluation? What were you trying to evaluate with regards to groups that were not there?

very limited proof is far from sufficient to support an inference that defendants wanted to drive plaintiffs out of business. Rather, Mr. Veighey said that defendants discussed the other employers because they did not want to hurt those employers by the wage pattern which might be set. There is simply no evidence in the record from which a reasonable jury could reach a different conclusion regarding defendants' motive or intent.

The record could support a finding that defendants' reason for standardizing wages was to protect the multi-trade/multi-employer bargaining concept. If unions or employers signed more attractive agreements after the multi-trade/multi-employer agreement had been agreed to, this would jeopardize ratification of the earlier pact and might discourage parties from participating in further multi-trade negotiating. This concern with the bargaining structure of the industry is very different from the predatory intent alleged in Pennington and presents few of the competitive dangers. Our analysis of the

"A: Frankly, we did not want to hurt anybody. We did not want to set up some sort of a situation that would hurt somebody.

"Q: What do you mean? How could the situation you were setting up hurt someone else?

"A: Well, as history indicates, there were employers that did not agree with our settlement.

"Q: At that time until the caucus in terms of what you were discussing, how could what you did hurt someone else?

"A: We came to the conclusion that it would not. We came to the conclusion because we were establishing a new concept of bargaining and everything that that contract had in it, arbitration, everything else and to pay the price that we had to pay to get that contract, plus faced with a carry over contract for a greater amount, we did not think we could do any better on our own or we did not think that others could, at least it was our opinion that others could not do any better on their own.

"Q: Is is fair, then, to say you came to the conclusion that that particular agreement would be good for the other employer groups as well as your own?

"A: It was our sincere hope that our decision would do that, right."

Pennington case and the standard of antitrust liability set forth later by the courts convince us that bare proof of an intent to protect multi-trade bargaining cannot be the basis for imposing antitrust liability.

On appeal and cross appeal, the judgment of the district court is affirmed.

APPENDIX B

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
FOR THE EASTERN DISTRICT OF MICHIGAN
SOUTHERN DIVISION

Civil Action No. 34664

James R. Snyder Co., Inc, et al.,
Plaintiffs

v.

The Associated General Contractors
Of America, et al.,
Defendants

ORAL OPINION OF JAMES P. CHURCHILL, UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE
October 18, 1979

THE COURT: I'm not going to try to keep you in suspense too long but I do want to comment for the record upon the nature of the proceedings and very briefly upon the unfortunate, in some way, delay which has occurred.

I think talking about justice delayed is justice denied, I don't think it's totally true but it is extremely unfortunate when it takes ten years to decide an important lawsuit. Sometimes the litigants themselves and the nature of the litigation is responsible. I really think the litigants and lawyers here are not responsible. I think the causes of it lie somewhat in the history of the court, somewhat the court's fault and somewhat not.

I think that this is a logical result of the problem, the process that used to be the policy of this court of passing tough cases down from judge to judge to judge and I am the fifth judge that got this case and I got it some four and a half years ago or five years ago and we are resolving it now and the principal reasons for the four years or four and a half year-delay after I got it was well there were really two reasons, one, it was a year or so it was involved in an appeal, I don't remember how long but there was an interim appeal, but really the essential thing was I had so many long, hard criminal cases.

It was only in the last year or so I have been able to face up to trying civil cases but I really feel that it is unfortunate that it has been so long and I think the changes are taking place that this type of delay is unlikely to ever occur in this court. I hope that is the case.

I don't mean every case is going to be tried the next day, a case like this naturally will take two or three years to work out properly but that is when it should be decided, two or three years afterwards, not nine years but it is done.

Notwithstanding the long delay it has been an excellently prepared, well-tried lawsuit up to this point. I really feel that I have to make fact findings in the first instance. I just feel it's my duty and I must make them although all of the elements are not the same, I don't have to get involved in some of the detailed elements so much but I do think the Court must determine whether nor not there was a conspiracy to do certain things or an agreement between the employers or some of them and the unions or some of them to put a restriction on the economic bargaining with the plaintiffs and if so who were the participants in it.

I don't think there is any question there was a conspiracy or an agreement between somebody; whether it's a conspiracy in the illegal sense of the word I'm not going to express an opinion at the moment but there had to be for this chain of events, there must have been some kind of agreement or meeting of the minds between union people or this could not have occurred. I don't thnk there is any question. I'm satisfied by a preponderance of the evidence that when the Detroit Mason Contractors Association sat down with the bricklayers and the material workers, the laborers unions that there was underlying that a feeling of commitment by the union people that they were obligated to hold out. I don't think that it would have occurred quite the same way it did and there wouldn't have been quite that hard a position taken by them unless they felt a commitment to somebody.

The real question is who was that commitment to and with, and essentially, in the final analysis, you have a group of defendants or some of them parties to such an agreement. That is one real distinct possibility. There are two bits, two or three things that indicate that is a possibility, is that it is definitely in the interest of the Associated General Contractors and the CEC to have the union told in their mind, they wanted this concept to work, but that is common sense, there is nothing wrong with wanting it to work. Then there is a statement made by the union people, and I believe it occurred and I don't remember the names, but I do believe that some one or two of the union people told Mr. Snyder — I believe this to be critical — that they said they were committed to the AGC.

But I also think it is a very strong possibility that there was a commitment, either as between the bricklayers and the laborers or even more likely, even though it may not be logical to somebody else, it is extremely likely that that night that the union representatives, when they were caucusing, saw that they were taking a political gamble, a big risk in going back to their people, and I haven't any doubt at all but what they discussed in that meeting and they had arrived at a meeting of the minds to hold the line, that they entered into an agreement with the AGC and the CEC and what have you, that they agreed between themselves to hold the line.

I don't think there is any question at all that the employer group that night were concerned with what would happen. I don't think they were really concerned with a lower price contract — the union people might have been — because I don't really see where a lower contract would hurt them, and I don't know that much about the economics of a construction business, but a lower price to the DMCA, a lower labor rate would help them in future negotiations temporarily in the competitive market. Anytime your supplier has a chance of getting something cheaper, you have a chance of getting it cheaper yourself and making some money. There is no reason in the world — unless you have a cost plus, I don't think they would raise the price in a cost plus, because they would in the long run kill themselves. There was really interest in that group.

The most damaging evidence of all, and I don't think we will ever know what happened, that there was a meeting of the minds, was Mr. Dailey's contract. I don't know what occurred; I could guess what occurred if his lawyer ever found out about it, but with his lawsuit pending, about the existence of a contract — of a telegram like that, that is what I meant, with a lawsuit pending over alleging a conspiracy to call a meeting with your alleged co-conspirators and ask why the hell did you do something that we allegedly didn't expect you to do, would be pretty damn damaging, if you pardon the expression, and I would say this, that I think there is enough evidence, if all of this evidence is in, to take that issue to the jury, I think the jury could find that there is such a conspiracy, at least with some of the defendants.

I am not sure how far — I haven't tried to analyze it that far as to which of all of the Defendants or which of all of the Plaintiffs would remain in, and I am extremely sympathetic of the good faith that this lawsuit has been pursued but, gentlemen, I do not find as a fact that there was such a conspiracy. I am just not convinced myself a preponderance of the evidence. I recognize it as one, real possibility. I think there are equal possibilities, but the problem you have here is that self-interest and expectation of what somebody will do is so completely consistent with what happened that what occurred did not have to have an expressed agreement between these two groups. There are two big groups, they are somewhat hostile groups, they don't trust each other, they have to live with each other. I don't think they can swing that kind of conspiracy on balance, so I do not find as a fact that there was an agreement between the employer groups and the union groups that the unions would not enter into an agreement at a different economic package. I think there is a strong expectation and, as I say, Mr. Dailey's telegram causes me to have some concern but weighed against all the other facts, I do not find that to be a fact. And if you take that out, then under the Enright case the most damaging evidence that could go to the jury comes out with it and it would have to be a directed verdict.

Recognizing, however, there is a possibility that Enright will be further modified or another Court may say I am wrong or that you will convince me on a motion for a rehearing that I am wrong in this respect, I think it is desirable to go on and make some further fact findings, that is what I think the evidence could -- that there is enough evidence to go to the jury. I am not going to put this over in terms of law.

For example, I think there is evidence, if we consider all this together, of the conspiracy; that if I don't strike the certain evidence under Enright, even though I don't find the facts myself, I believe a jury could come to a definite conclusion and I would give it to the jury, the issue of whether or not there is a conspiracy.

It would also be a fact issue as to which of the Defendants would have been involved in it. If there is a conspiracy, it must have occurred at the table that night and, therefore, I think there would be enough to go the jury with respect to all persons who sat at that table that night and their respective organizations and companies that they represent, because while Mr. Dailey was there in a capacity as spokesman for the CEC, he was also there for the AGC and he was also there for R. E. Dailey Company, he was there for Thomas E. Dailey, and that is probably true with some of the others, so if on the issue of who was involved, if there is enough to go to the jury, I would find as a fact there is enough to go to the jury on the conspiracy issue as to each of the Defendants.

About the competition, I don't think you have enough to go to the jury that there was any intent on anyone's part to harm the Plaintiffs as a group. I don't think they were particularly interested in the Plaintiff as the groups had been, they were invited to come in and they are going to look after themselves. The CEC invited the Detroit Mason Contractors to come into this thing and if they didn't, the devil take the hindpost, they can take care of themselves.

They weren't particularly concerned with the self — with the interest of J. R. Snyder and Ebling and Hicks and so forth except as they could — they were concerned that it would be in their self-interest because it might help make the whole thing go, but I certainly don't find any motivation or intent on the part of any of these people to hurt anybody from a competitive point of view. It doesn't make sense that a group of general contractors want to drive out any mason contractors out of business. They need them. If they want to get rid of the mason contractors, all they have to do is hire them and hire the bricklayers themselves. There is nothing in the world that requires, that I could tell from the others in this case, a general contractor to hire a — to subcontract the mason work. They must find it to be efficient and in their self-interest to do so, so they do hire, they do subcontract, but certainly there is no reason in the world that Mr. Dailey or anyone else wanted to hide or entered into any kind of an agreement for the purpose of harming the mason subcontractors, let alone drive them out of business.

I think that Mr. Snyder's concern was real that he was going some day to get wrapped up into some kind of a contract that would hurt him on jurisdictional disputes and they were operating under different economic conditions and they surely didn't want to get wrapped up with the carpenters and so on, and his concern was very real, but that doesn't mean that was the motive of Mr. Dailey and his group.

While I would let it go to the jury on the one issue I would not let it go to the issue of harm if you convince me either driving him out of business or causing him some kind of a harm was a necessary element, because that is what I mean is the question of law and the question of fact. I don't mean to decide the question of law at the moment, because I have to direct the verdict because of the previous decision.

As far as Plaintiffs are concerned, if I did let this go to a jury, it would only be with respect to the group of Plaintiffs that, and if harm — I really would have to say that we know so little about the economic circumstances of this group that are not within this sub-class that we defined on the record of full-time material — that I would probably dismiss the case out against the members of the class who would not fall into that full-time category.

Were the objects of the conspiracy successful? Well, not totally and perfectly. Somebody broke the line a little bit on the three-year contract, but I think there is an issue there that could to go the jury. And was harm caused, did they, in fact, have to bargain for more? Could the Plaintiffs, could the Detroit Mason Contractors have settled for less than a dollar? I haven't any idea.

I went a long ways and I allowed Mr. Snyder's opinion to come in simply because it is probably the best evidence in the world. I doubt there is anybody in the world that has a better, realistic idea what they could settle for unless it was the union people on the other side of the table. It is like saying who would have the ball game last night if he pitched the low ball instead of a high ball. I did knowingly let that evidence in and I would let that issue go to the jury, too, if we were going to go to the jury.

I am sure that if I took this and went in my office for a week and wrote an opinion I could say the things that I have said with much greater clarity, but I thought it has been long enough, it was time for me to decide this and I can sincerely say to you I didn't know until this afternoon which way I was going to decide, but one of the hardest things that a judge has to learn is how do you decide facts. Well, if you can't decide them, if you don't know, you decide them against the party who has the burden of proof; it is as simple as that. I don't know to this day whether there was a conspiracy between these people or not, but the plaintiff has the burden of showing it in order to get the evidence in. He has failed to satisfy me by even the slightest preponderance. At best, the evidence is equal and therefore, the evidence is suppressed, the motion for a directed verdict is granted.
